sporogenous (spôr-roj'e-nus), a. [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. γενεῖν, producing: see -genous.] Reproducing or reproduced by means of spores; sporiparous; bearing or producing spores.—Sporogenous layer, in hymenomycetous fungi, same as hymenium.—Sporogenous tissue, in bot., the tissue from which the spores are developed.

sporogone (spôr-rö-gön), n. [< NL. sporogonium.] In bot., same as sporogonium.

sporogonium (spôr-rö-gö'ni-um), n.; pl. sporogonia (-ä). [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. γονή, generation.] In bot., the sporocarp in the Muscinææ. It is the capsule or "moss-fruit," with its various appendages, being the whole product of the sexual act, and remaining attached to, but not in organic connection with, the plant bearing the sexual organs. See Musci, and cut under moss.

sporogony (spôr-roj'ö-ni), n. [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. γονία, < γόνος, producing: see -gony.] Same as sporogenesis, 2.

sporoid (spôr'roid), a. [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Resembling a spore; sporular.

sporologist (spôr-rol'ö-jist), n. [*< sporolog-y (< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. λογία, < λέγειν, speak) + -ist.] In bot., a botanist, especially a lichenologist, who gives prominence to the spore as a basis of classification.

sporont (spôr'ront), n. [< Gr. σπορά, seed, + ὄν (όντ-), being, ppr. of εἶναι, be: see ens and be.] A gregarine not provided with an epimerite, or proboscoidiform organ which attaches the parasite to its host: distinguished from cephalont.

sporophore (spôr-rö-för), n. [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. φέρω, < φέρω = *E. bear*¹.] In bot.: (a) A placenta. (b) The branch or part of the thallus which bears spores or spore mother-cells. The various forms are further distinguished as gonidiophore, sporangiphore, ascophore, etc. (c) In Archegoniateæ, a sporophyte. Also called encarpium.—Compound sporophore, a sporophore formed by the cohesion of the ramifications of separate hyphal branches.—Filamentous sporophore, same as single sporophore.—Simple sporophore, a sporophore consisting of a single hypha, or branch of a hypha.

sporophoric (spôr-rö-för'ik), a. [< sporophore + -ic.] Having the character of a sporophore.

sporophorous (spôr-rof'ö-rus), a. [As sporophore + -ous.] In bot.: (a) Spore-bearing. (b) Of or pertaining to the sporophore.

sporophyas (spôr-rof'i-as), n. [NL. (A. Braun), < spora, spore, + Gr. φέρω, produce.] Same as sporophydium.

A. Kampe! Sporocyst of Bucephalus; B, part of same, more magnified; C, outer coat; D, germ masses; E, one of these, more magnified still.

sporophyidium (spō-rō-fīd'ī-um), n.; pl. sporophydia (-ī-). [NL. (T. F. Allen, 1888), < spora, spore, + Gr. phya, produce, + -idium, dim. suffix.] In bot., in the Characeæ, a term applied to the whole fruit, including the spore proper, its basal cell, and the enveloping cells. It is the same, or nearly the same, as the anthidium of Sachs and Goebel, the sporophylls of Braun, the "enveloped ovonium" of Celakowsky, and the sporangium of authors in general. See spermatocarp.

sporophyll, sporophyll (spō-rō-fīl), n. [< NL. sporophyllum, < spora, spore, + Gr. phyllos, a leaf.] In bot., the leaf or leaf-like organ which bears the spores, or receptacles containing the spores, in many of the vascular cryptogams. It is usually more or less modified and unlike the normal leaves, as in the spikes of Lycopodium, Selaginella, Ophioglossum, etc. See cuts under these words, also under Osmunda, polypody, and sorus.

sporophyte (spō-rō-fīt), n. [< NL. spora, spore, + Gr. phytōn, plant.] In bot., the segment or stage of the life-cycle of the higher cryptogams (Pteridophyta, Bryophyta) in which the non-sexual organs of reproduction are borne. It is a stage in what has been called the alternation of generations, and is the fern-plant, club-moss plant, etc., of popular language. It bears the spores in countless numbers. By some authors the word sporophore is used for sporophyte. Compare ophyte and ophore. See Musci.

sporophytic (spō-rō-fīt'ik), a. [< sporophyte + -ic.] In bot., belonging to, resembling, or characteristic of a sporophyte.

sporosac (spō-rō-sak), n. [< NL. spora, spore, + L. sacus, sack: see *sack*².] 1. In Hydrozoa, a degenerate medusiform person; one of the simple generative buds or gonophores of certain hydrozoans in which the medusoid structure is not developed. Encyc. Brit., XII. 554.—2. In Ferres, a sporocyst or redia. See sporocyst (b).

sporostegium (spō-rō-stē'jī-um), n.; pl. sporostegia (-ī-). [NL., < spora, spore, + Gr. stēgion, cover, roof.] In bot., in the Characeæ, the characteristic spirally twisted or furrowed shell of the oöspore. It is thick and hard, usually black or brown in color, and consists of five cells which arise from the base of the spore. It is the so-called Chara-fruit.

sporous (spō-rus), a. [*< spore*² + -ous.] In bot., of or pertaining to a spore.

Sporozoa (spō-rō-zō'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπορά, seed, + ζῷον, an animal.] 1. Mouthless parasitic ciliate protozoans, a class of Protozoa, synonymous with Gregarinida, but more comprehensive, including many organisms not ordinarily classed with the gregarines. They are parasitic, and occur in almost all animals. Most are very minute, but some attain the largest size by far known among protozoans. The Sporozoa have been divided into four subclasses, Gregarinida, Coccidiea, Myxosporidia, and Sarcocystidia. Also called Cytocida.

2. [i. e.] Plural of sporozoön.

sporozoan (spō-rō-zō'an), a. and n. [< Sporozoa + -an.] 1. a. Having the characters of the Sporozoa; pertaining to the Sporozoa.

II. n. A member of the Sporozoa.

sporozoic (spō-rō-zō'ik), a. [< Sporozoa + -ic.] Same as sporozoan.

sporozooid (spō-rō-zō'oid), n. [< Gr. σπόρος, seed, + zōoid.] In biol., a zoöspore.

sporozoön (spō-rō-zō'ōn), n.; pl. sporozoa (-ā). [NL.: see Sporozoa.] An individual of the Sporozoa; a sporozoan.

7. Play; idle jingle.

An author who should introduce such a sport of words upon the stage even in the comedy of our days would meet with small applause.
W. Broome, Notes on Pope's Odyssey, ix. 432.

8. In zoöl. and bot., an animal or a plant, or any part of one, that varies suddenly or singularly from the normal type of structure, and is usually of transient character, or not perpetuated.

A sport is generally an individual variation of apparently spontaneous origin. The difference from the normal type is usually slight, but may be quite marked; in either case its tendency is to disappear with the individual in which it arises, though some sports repeat themselves, or may be preserved by careful selection. If perpetuated, it becomes a strain, breed, or variety. Sports are observed chiefly among domesticated animals and cultivated plants. Many of the beautiful or curious hothouse-flowers are mere sports, that are produced by high cultivation, crossing, or accident, and some valued breeds of domestic animals have arisen in like manner. Monstrous characters are sometimes acquired, but mere monstrosities or malformations are not usually called sports. Compare spontaneity, 2 (a), and freak of nature (under *freak*²).

9. A sporting man; one who is interested in open-air sports; hence, in a bad sense, a betting man; a gambler; a blackleg. [Colloq.]

Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

3. To bring out hastily or unexpectedly; produce suddenly; bring, show, contrive, etc., with unexpected promptness, or as a surprise.

I may perhaps spring a wife for you anon.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, v. 3.

Surprised with fright,

She starts and leaves her bed, and springs a light.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., x. 153.

The friends to the cause sprang a new project. Swift.

It's a feast at a poor country labourer's place when he springs sixpenn'orth of fresh herrings.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, i. 53.

4. To jump over; leap.

Far be the spirit of the chase from them [women]!

Uncomely courage, unbeseeching skill;

To spring the fence, to rein the prancing steed.

Thomson, Autumn, i. 575.

5†. To cause to spring up or arise; bring forth; generate.

Two wellis there bethe, I telle thee,

That sprynge the oyle, there men may see.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 142.

Their indulgence must not spring in me

A fond opinion that he cannot err.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 1.

6†. To scatter as in sowing; strew about; shed here and there; sprinkle (a liquid).

Before these Ydoles men sleen here Children many tymes, and sprynge the Blood upon the Ydoles; and so thei maken here Sacrifice.

Manderill, Travels, p. 170.

7. To sprinkle, as with fine drops, particles, or spots; especially, to moisten with drops of a liquid: as, to spring clothes. [Now only prov. Eng.]

With holi water thou schalt me springe,

And as the snowe I schal be whylt.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 253.

8. To shiver; split; crack: as, to spring a bat; the mast was sprung.

Our shippes [were] in very good plight, more then that the Mary Rose, by some mischance, either sprang or spent her fore-yard.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 609.

9. To cause to burst or explode; discharge.

I sprung a mine, whereby the whole nest was overthrown.

Addison, Spectator.

10. To shift out of place; relax; loosen.

The linch-pins of the wagon are probably lost, and the tire of the wheels sprung.

H. B. Stone, Oldtown, p. 178.

Specifically—11. To relax the spring of; cause to act suddenly by means of a spring; touch off, as by a trigger: as, to spring a trap; to spring a rattle; also figuratively: as, to spring a plot or a joke.

He shall weave his snares,

And spring them on thy careless steps.

Bryant, Antiquity of Freedom.

12. To bend by force, as something stiff or strong.—13. To insert, as a beam in a place too short for it, by bending it so as to bring the ends nearer together, and allowing it to straighten when in place: usually with in: as, to spring in a slat or bar.—14. In arch., to commence from an abutment or pier: as, to spring an arch.—15. Naut., to haul by means of springs or cables: as, to spring the stern of a vessel around.—16. In carp., to unite (the boards of a roof) with bevel-joints in order to keep out wet.—To spring a butt (naut.). See butt 2.—To spring a leak. See leak.—To spring her luff (naut.). See luff 2.

spring (spring), n. and a. [ME. spring, springe, a leap, sprung, springe, a spring (of water), a rod, a sprig, < AS. spring, springa, a leap, a spring, fountain, ulcer, = OS. spring (in ah-sprung = AS. c-sprung, a well, 'water-spring') = OFries. spring (in spedelspring) = MLG. sprink = OHG. spring, sprung, MHG. sprinc, sprunc, G. spring, a spring of water (cf. sprung, a leap) = Sw. Dan. spring, a leap, run, spring (cf. Sw. språng, a leap, bound, water-spring); from the verb: see spring, v.] I. n. 1. The act of springing or leaping. (a) A leaping or darting; a vault; a bound.

The Indian immediately started back, whilst the lion rose with a spring, and leaped towards him.

Addison, Spectator, No. 56.

(b) A flying back; the resilience of a body recovering its former state by its elasticity.

The bow well bent, and smart the spring.

Conquer, Human Frailty.

2. The act or time of springing or appearing; the first appearance; the beginning; birth; rise; origin: as, the spring of mankind; the spring of the year; the spring of the morning or of the day (see dayspring). [Archaic except as in def. 3 and its figurative use.]

Men, if we view them in their spring, are at the first without understanding or knowledge at all.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 6.

This river taketh spring out of a certain lake eastward.

B. Jonson, Masque of Blackness.

So great odds there is between the Spring and Fall of Fortune.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 126.

At morning spring and even-fall

Sweet voices in the still air singing.

Whittier, Mogg Megone, ii.

Specifically—3. The first of the four seasons of the year; the season in which plants begin to vegetate and rise; the vernal season (see season); hence, figuratively, the first and freshest period of any time or condition.

* Rough winter spent,

The pleasant spring straight draweth in ure.

Surrey, The Lower Comforteth Himself.

My hasting days fly on with full career,

But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.

Milton, Sonnets, ii.

4. That which springs or shoots up. (a†) A sprout; shoot; branch; sapling.

*Spring*s and plantes, any spry that growt out of any tree.

Arnold's Chron., p. 168.

This canker that eats up Love's tender spring.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, i. 656.

(b) A young wood; any piece of woodland; a grove; a shrubbery. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

When the spring is of two years' growth, draw part of it for quick-sets.

Evelyn, Sylva, III. viii. § 23.

(c†) A rod; a switch.

For ho so spareth the spring spillett hus children;

And so wrot the wise to wissen us alle.

Piers Plowman (C), vi. 139.

5†. A youth; a springal.

The one his bowe and shafts, the other Spring

A burning Teade about his head did move.

Spenser, Muioptomos, i. 292.

Ca' me nae mair Sir Donald,

But ae spring Donald your son.

Lizzie Lindsay (Child's Ballads, IV. 65).

6†. Offspring; race.

Who on all the human spring conferred confusion.

Chapman, (Imp. Dict.)

7. Water rising to the surface of the earth from below, and either flowing away in the form of a small stream or standing as a pool or small lake. Rivers are chiefly fed, both before and after being joined by their various affluents, by underground springs, and some pools of water large enough to be called ponds or even lakes are supplied in the same way. The conditions under which springs are formed are exceedingly variable, at once as regards the quantity of water, its temperature, the amount and nature of the gaseous and solid substances which it holds in solution, and the manner in which it is delivered at the surface; hence springs are variously designated in accordance with these peculiarities, the most familiar terms used for this purpose being shallow, simple, common, or surface; hot, boiling, thermal; mineral, medicinal; and spouting, or geyser, as this kind of spring is more generally called. Shallow or surface springs ordinarily furnish water which is pretty nearly pure, can be used for drinking, and does not differ much in temperature from the mean of the locality where they occur. They are due to the fact that the water falling on the surface in the form of rain, or furnished by melting snow, sinks to a certain depth (according as the soil and underlying rocks are more or less porous or permeable), where it is held in greater or less quantity according to the amount of rainfall and the thickness and relative position of the various permeable and impermeable formations with which it is brought in contact, but seeks under the influence of gravitation to escape, and makes its appearance at the surface when the topographical or geological conditions are favorable. Thus, a bed of gravel or sand resting on a mass of clay (the former being very permeable, the latter almost impermeable) will become saturated with water below a certain depth, the distance from the surface of the saturated sand or gravel, or the line of saturation, as it is called, varying with the climate and season. If, however, there be an adjacent ravine or valley which is cut deep enough to expose the line of junction of the permeable and impermeable formations, the water will escape along this line in greater or less quantity, giving rise to springs, which will vary in number and copiousness with the varying conditions which present themselves. The water of such springs, not having descended to any great depth, will not vary much in temperature from the mean of the locality. Very different are the conditions in the case of thermal or hot springs, which may have any temperature up to boiling, and of which the water may have been heated either by coming from great depths or by contact with volcanic rocks; hence thermal springs are phenomena very characteristic of volcanic and geologically disturbed or faulted regions, and those hot springs which are of the geyser type (see geyser) are most interesting from the scenic point of view. The medicinal properties and curative effects of various hot springs are of great practical importance; and many such springs, in Europe and the United States, are places much resorted to by invalids and pleasure-seekers. The variety of constituents, both solid and gaseous, held in solution by different hot springs is very great. From the medicinal point of view, springs are variously classi-springe¹ (sprɪnj), v. t.; pret. and pp. springed, ppr. springeing. [< ME. sprengen, < AS. sprengan, causal of springing, spring: see spring, and cf. spring (of which springe is the proper form (cf. sings, as related to sing), now only dialectal.) To sprinkle. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

springe² (sprinj), n. [< ME. springe, < springen, spring; see sprin, v. Cf. springle, and D. spring-net, a spring-net, OHG. springa, MHG. sprinke, a bird-snare.] A noose or snare for catching small game; a gin. It is usually secured to an elastic branch, or small sapling, which is bent over and secured by some sort of trigger which the movements of the animal will release, when it flies up and the noose catches the game.

A woodcock to mine own springe.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 317.

I will teach thee a springe, Tony, to catch a pewit.
Scott, Kenilworth, xli.

springe² (sprinj), v.; pret. and pp. springed, ppr. springing. [< springe², n.] I. trans. To catch in a springe.

We springe ourselves, we sink in our own bogs.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 1.

II. intrans. To set springes; catch game by means of springes.

springe³ (sprinj), a. [< spring, v.] Active; nimble; brisk; agile. [Prov. Eng.]

The squire's pretty springe, considering his weight.
George Eliot, Silas Marner, xi.

springer (spring'ér), n. [< spring + -er¹] 1. One who or that which springs, in any sense. (a) A growing plant, shrub, or tree; a sapling.

The young men and maidens go out into the woods and coppices, cut down and spoil young springers to dress up their May-booths.
Evelyn, Sylva, IV. iv. § 4.

(b) A youth; a lad. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

2. In arch.: (a) The impost or place where the vertical support to an arch terminates, and the curve of the arch begins. (b) The lower voussoir or bottom stone of an arch, which lies immediately upon the impost. (c) The bottom stone of the coping of a gable. (d) The rib of a groined roof or vault. See cross-springer.—

3. A dog of a class of spaniels resembling the cocker, used, in sporting, to spring or flush game. See spaniel.

The Springer is smaller than the former (the Water Spaniel), of elegant form, gay aspect, and usually white with red spots, black nose and palate.
Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 376.

4. The springbok.—5. A grampus.—Springer antelope, the springbok.

Springfield gun, rifle. See gun¹, rifle², also cut under bullet.

spring-flood (spring'flud), n. [< ME. spring-flood (= D. spring-floed = G. spring-fluth = Sw. Dan. spring-flod); as spring + flood.] Same as springtide.

Than shal she [the moon] been evene atte fulle alway,
And spring-flood laste bothe nyght and day.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 342.

spring-fly (spring'fi), n. A caddis-fly.

spring-forelock (spring'fôr'lok), n. A cotterkey having a spring in the entering end to prevent its accidental withdrawal. E. H. Knight.

spring-garden (spring'gär'dn), n. A word of doubtful meaning, possibly a corrupt form; perhaps, according to Nares, a garden where concealed springs were made to spout jets of water upon the visitors.

Sophocles [bound]. Thy slave, proud Martius?
... not a vein runs here

From head to foot, but Sophocles would unseam, and Like a spring-garden shoot his scornful blood
Into their eyes durst come to tread on him.
Beau and Fl., Four Plays in One, Play 1st.

spring-gun (spring'gun), n. A gun which is discharged by the stumbling of a trespasser upon it, or against a wire connected with the trigger; also, a gun similarly set for large animals, as bears or wolves.

spring-haas (spring'häs), n. [< S. African D. spring-haas, < spring (= E. spring) + haas, a hare, = E. hare: see spring and hare¹.] The Cape jumping-hare, Pedetes caffer, a kind of jerboa, of the family Dipodidae. See cut under Pedetes.

spring-halt (spring'hält), n. [Also, corruptly, spring-halt; < spring + halt¹.] An involuntary convulsive movement of the muscles of either hind leg in the horse, by which the leg is suddenly and unduly raised from the ground and lowered again with unnatural force; also, the nervous disorder on which such movements depend, and the resulting gait.

One would take it,
That never saw 'em pace before, the spavin
Or springhalt reign'd among 'em.
Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 3. 13.

spring-hammer (spring'ham'ér), n. A machine-hammer in which the blow is partly or wholly made by a spring to which tension has been imparted by mechanism during the lift of the hammer-head. In some hammers the spring is a volume of confined and compressed air. In the accompanying cut a is the anvil-block; b, anvil; c, frame; d, guides for hammer; e, piston-rod; f, cylinder; g, hammer; h, crank (driven by the pulley i) which lifts the hammer, at the same time compressing the air in the air-spring cylinder f; j, idler-pulley which tightens the driving-belt k when pressed against the belt by the action of the rock-lever l, the rod m, and the foot-lever or treadle n—the rock-lever l being pivoted to the frame at m, while the treadle is pivoted to it at p. Pressure upon the treadle by the foot tightens the belt, and the hammer is then raised. The treadle is then relieved from pressure, the belt is slackened on the pulley j, and the compressed air, acting on the piston, delivers the blow, the belt then slipping easily over the pulley j.

spring-hanger (spring'hang'ér), n. A U-shaped strap of iron serving to support the end of a semi-elliptical car-spring.

spring-head (spring'hed), n. 1. A fountain-head; a source.

Water will not ascend higher than the level of the first spring-head from whence it descendeth.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

2. A clutch, button, or other connecting device at the end of an elliptic carriage-spring.

spring-headed† (spring'hed'ed), a. Having heads that spring afresh. [Rare.]

Spring-headed Hydres, and sea-shouldering Whales.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 23.

spring-hook (spring'hük), n. 1. In locomotives, a hook fixing the driving-wheel spring to the frame.—2. A latch or door-hook having a spring-catch for keeping it fast in the staple.—3. A fish-hook set like a spring-trap, with a supplementary hook, which, on being released, fixes itself in the fish; a snap-hook. Also called spear-hook.

spring-house (spring'hous), n. A small building constructed over a spring or brook, where milk, fresh meat, etc., are placed in order to be kept cool in or near the running water. [U. S.]

As I was a-settin' in the spring-house, this mornin', a-workin' my butter, I says to Dinah, "I'm goin' to carry a pot of this down to Miss Scudder."
H. B. Stowe, Minister's Wooing, iv.

springiness (spring'ines), n. 1. The state or property of being springy; elasticity.

The air is a thin fluid body endowed with elasticity and springiness, capable of condensation and rarefaction.

Bentley.

2. The state of abounding with springs; wetness; sponginess, as of land.

springing (spring'ing), n. [< ME. springing, springynge; verbal n. of spring, v.] 1. The act or process of leaping, arising, issuing, or proceeding; also, growth; increase.

The Poo out of a welle smal Taket his firste springing and his sors.
Chaucer, Prolog. to Clerk's Tale, l. 49.

Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it. . . Thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof.
Ps. lxx. 10.

2. In arch., the point from which an arch springs or rises; also, a springer.

springing (spring'ing), p. a. Liable to arise; contingent: as, springing uses. See use.

springing-beetle (spring'ing-bē'tl), n. Same as spring-beetle.

springing-course (spring'ing-körs), n. See course¹.

springing-hairs (spring'ing-härz), n. pl. The locomotory cilia of some infusorians, as the Halteridæ, by means of which these animal-clebs skip about.

springing-line (spring'ing-lin), n. The line from which an arch springs or rises; the line in which the springers rest on the imposts, and from which the rise or versed sine is calculated.

springing-time† (spring'ing-tim), n. [< ME. springing time; < springing + time.] The time of the new growing of plants; spring-time; spring.

[The first age of man foond & light,
The springing time clepe "ver."
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 169.

springing-tool (spring'ing-töl), n. In iron-working, same as hanging-tool.

springing-wall (spring'ing-wäl), n. In building, a buttress.

spring-jack (spring'jak), n. In teleg., a device for inserting a loop in a line-circuit. It usually consists of a plug to be inserted between two spring-contacts, the ends of the loop being joined to metallic strips fixed to the opposite sides of the insulating plug. If the latter is entirely of insulating material, it becomes a spring-jack cut-out.

spring-latch (spring'lach), n. A latch that snaps into the keeper after yielding to the pressure against it. See cuts under latch.

springle (spring'l), n. [= D. G. spreukel, a noose, snare, springe, = Sw. spränkla, a springle, = Dan. sprinkel, trellis; a dim. of spring, springe, in similar senses: see spring, springe².] 1. A springe.

They [woodcocks] arrive first on the north coast, where almost euerie hedge seruth for a roade and euerie plash-oote for springles to take them.
R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 25.

2. A rod about four feet in length, used in thatching. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

springless (spring'les), a. [< spring + -less.] Lacking springs or spring. (a) Having no springs, or natural fountains of water. (b) Lacking elastic springs: as, a springless wagon.

springlet (spring'let), n. [< spring + -let.] A little spring; a small stream.

But yet from out the little hill Oozes the slender springlet still.
Scott, Marmion, vi. 37.

spring-ligament (spring'lig'a-ment), n. The inferior calcaneoscapoid ligament of the sole of the foot, connecting the os calcis or heel-bone with the scaphoid, supporting the head of the astragalus, and forming part of the articular cavity in which the latter is received.

springlike (spring'lik), a. Resembling spring; characteristic of spring; verbal: as, springlike weather; a springlike temperature.

There the last blossoms spring-like pride unfold.
Savage, Wanderer, v.

spring-line (spring'lin), n. In milit. engin., a line passing diagonally from one pontoon of a bridge to another.

spring-lock (spring'lok), n. A lock which fastens itself automatically by a spring when the door or lid to which it is attached is shut. Also called latch-lock.

spring-mattress (spring'mat'res), n. See mattress and spring-bed.

spring-net (spring'net), n. A bird-net which can be shut by means of a spring and trigger; a flap-net. A net of similar form is used for trapping rabbits.

springold†, n. Same as springal¹.

springold†, springow†, n. Same as springal².

spring-oyster (spring'oys'tër), n. A thorn-oyster. See cut under Spingydus.

spring-padlock (spring'pad'lok), n. A padlock which locks automatically by means of a spring when the hasp is pressed into its seat.

spring-pawl (spring'päl), n. A pawl actuated by a spring.

spring-plank (spring'plangk), n. A transverse timber beneath a railway truck-bolster, forming a support for the bolster-springs. E. H. Knight.

spring-pole (spring'pöl), n. A pole fastened so that its elasticity can be used for some mechanical purpose.—Spring-pole drilling, a method of boring holes in rock for oil, water, or any other purpose, in which the rods and drill are suspended from a spring-pole, which by its elasticity lifts them up after every stroke. The down motion is effected by hand-power, or sometime, a stirrup is added to enable the driller to use his feet. Prospecting-holes of from two to three inches in diameter can be bored with this simple apparatus to the depth of one or two hundred feet, or even more.

spring-punch (spring'punch), n. A punch which has a spring to throw it back after it has been driven down by pressure. This is usually done only in quick-working punches which are driven by the blows of a hammer, or in hand-punches such as those used by shoemakers, railway conductors, etc.

spring-searcher (spring'sér'chèr), n. A tool having steel prongs projected by springs, used to detect defects in a cannon-bore.

spring-shackle (spring'shak'l), n. 1. A shackle closed by a spring.—2. A shackle connecting two springs, or connecting a spring to a rigid part: used in vehicles, etc.

spring-stay (spring'stä), n. Naut. See stay¹.

spring-stud (spring'stud), n. A rod passed through the axis of a coil-spring to hold the spring-stud. The upper end works in a guide. See under over.

springtail (spring'tail), n. 1. A collembolous thysanurous insect which leaps or skips about by means of abdominal humps.

noting like a spring, as any position. It creates the final humps, is limited and bent under the body, forming a spring by the aid of which they leap to a great height. They are found in gardens, in hollows, on manure-heaps in winter and on snow, and may also be seen on the surface of water in quiet pools. See Collembola, Polina, and Thysanura.

2. A thysanurous insect of the suborder Cinara, often called bristletail. See Cinara, Lepisma, and cut under silverfish.—3. One of certain minute neuropterous insects of the panorpidae genus Boreas, found in moss and on the surface of snow; a snow-fly. This insect springs, but not by means of anal appendages.

spring-tailed (spring'taid), a. Springing by means of the tail, or having a spring on the tail, as a collembolous insect; thysanurous; podorous.

spring-tide (spring'tid), n. [= D. spring-tij, spring-tide, = G. spring-zeit, high tide, = Sw. Dan. spring-tid, spring-tide; as spring, v., rise, + tid.] 1. The tide which occurs at or soon after the new and full moon, and rises higher than common tides, the ebb sinking correspondingly lower. At these times the sun and moon are in a straight line with the earth, and their combined influence in raising the waters of the ocean is the greatest, consequently the tides thus produced are the highest. See tide. Hence—2. Figuratively, any great flood or influx.

Yet are they doubly replenished by the first and latter spring-tides of devotion. Sandys, Travailes, p. 160.

springtide (spring'tid), n. [< spring, n., 3, + tid.] Springtime.

Sounds as of the springtide they, . . . While the chill months long for May. D. G. Rossetti, Love's Nocturn.

springtime (spring'tim), n. Spring.

Primrose, first-born child of Ver, Merry springtime's harbingers. Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 1.

spring-tool (spring'töl), n. A light tongs closing by a spring, used by glass-blowers.

spring-trap (spring'trap), n. 1. A trap working by a spring, which may cause a door or bar to fall when the detent is released by the moving of the bait, or may throttle the victim, as in an ordinary form of mouse-trap, etc.—2. A form of steam-trap. E. H. Knight.

spring-valve (spring'valv), n. 1. A valve fitted with a spring, which holds it to its seat except when it is opened by extraneous force.—2. A safety-valve with which is connected a spring-balance, graduated to any required number of pounds, and acting as a check on the valve until the determined pressure is attained. See cut under safety-valve.

spring-wagon (spring'wag'on), n. A wagon the bed of which rests on springs.

spring-water (spring'wä'ter), n. Water issuing from a spring: in contradistinction to river-water, rain-water, etc.

Spare Diet, and Spring-water clear, Physicians hold are good. Prior, Wandering Pilgrim.

spring-weir (spring'wér), n. A kind of weir arranged to drop to the bottom at low water, and allow the fish to pass over it with the incoming tide, while at high water it is lifted up. It is worked from the shore by means of capstans and ropes, so that it forms an impassable barrier to the fish, which are retained as the tide passes out, and are thus taken in large numbers. [Maine.]

spring-worm (spring'wérn), n. A pin-worm, as Agrius remicularis: a small threadworm. See cut under Oryzias.

springwort (spring'wört), n. [< ME. spring-wort, springwort; < spring + wort.] In European folk-lore, a plant to which various magical virtues were attributed, among them that of drawing down the lightning and dividing the storm: identified by Grimm with the caperspurge, Euphorbia Lathyrus. Dyer, Folk-lore of Plants.

springy (spring'i), a. [< spring + -y.] 1. Having elasticity like that of a spring; elastic; light; as, springy steel; a springy step.

Which vast contraction and expansion seems unintelligible by fagging the particles of air to be springy and ramous. Newton, Opticks, iii. query 31.

2. Abounding with springs or fountains; wet; spongy: as, springy land.

sprink (springk), v. t. [A dial. var. of spring; cf. sprinkle.] To sprinkle; splash. Halliwel. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

sprink (springk), n. [< sprink, v.] 1. A sprinkle; a drop, as of water. Howell, Arbor of Amittie (1568). (Nares.)—2. A crack or flaw. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

sprink-buck (springk'buk), n. Same as spring-buck.

sprinkle (spring'kl), v.; pret. and pp. sprinkled, ppr. sprinkling. [Early mod. spruce³ (sprōs), n. [An abbr. of spruce-fir.] A coniferous tree of the genus Picea; a spruce-fir. The species are handsome evergreens of a conical habit, often of great economic worth. Some related trees are also called spruce. See specific names below.

Brussels Sprouts, Brassica oleracea, var. gemmifera.

Black spruce, Picea mariana (Mill.) B.S.P. A species of spruce growing throughout the northern United States and in the Alleghenies to North Carolina. It is a hardy tree, growing to a height of 100 feet, with a trunk that is straight and free from branches for the lower 40 feet. The bark is grayish-brown, furrowed, and covered with a thin layer of lichen. The leaves are needle-like, dark green above and white below, and are arranged in spirals. The cones are small, cylindrical, and covered with a thin layer of scales. The wood is hard and heavy, and is used for building, for fuel, and for making paper.

Blue spruce, Picea canadensis (Mill.) B.S.P. Same as white spruce. Double spruce, Picea canadensis (Mill.) B.S.P. Same as white spruce. Essence of spruce, a thick liquid obtained from the young branches of the spruce by boiling and evaporation from the young branches of the spruce, the black spruce, and perhaps other species. It is used in making spruce-beer.

Hemlock spruce, Picea canadensis (Mill.) B.S.P. Same as white spruce. Indian spruce, Picea canadensis (Mill.) B.S.P. Same as white spruce. New Zealand spruce, the mountain pine, Pinus montana (Mill.) B.S.P. A beautiful tree with long weeping branches.

From the young growth Captain Cook made an antiscorbutic spruce-beer. See antiscorbutic spruce-beer.

Norway spruce, Picea excelsa, a spruce of middle and northern Europe and northern Asia. It attains a height of 100 feet, forms extensive forests, endures severe cold, and on mountains reaches an elevation of 4,500 feet. Its tough and elastic wood is the white wood of Europe, excellent for building, furniture, masts, spars, etc. It is the source of Burgundy pitch. See pitch.

Oil of spruce, oil of hemlock. Red spruce, a stunted variety (P. rubra) of the black spruce, growing in swamps. Single spruce. Same as white spruce (a).

Spruce bud-louse, an aphid of the subfamily Chermesinae, Adelges abieticola, which deforms the end-shoots of the spruce in the United States, producing large swellings sometimes mistaken for the natural cones. In Europe A. coccineus and A. strabus have the same habit.

Spruce bud-worm, the larva of a tortricid moth, as Tortrix fumiferana, which eats the end-buds of the spruce in northeastern parts of the United States, especially in Maine. Other spruce bud-worms are the reddish-yellow, Stenopneucha rufobrunnea; the black-headed, Tortrix variaria; and the red, Gelechia obliquistrigella.

Spruce cone-worm, the larva of a phycid moth, Pinipectis tentaculata, which bores the fresh young cones of spruces in the United States. Spruce leaf-hopper, an oblong shining-black leaf-hopper, Athysanella abietis, which punctures spruce-needles in May and June in the United States.

Spruce plume-moth, Cryptopis nigrolineatus. Its larva feeds on spruce, and it is the only member of the Pterophoridae known to infest any conifer. Spruce saw-fly, a common saw-fly, Lophyrus abietis, whose pale-green larvae defoliate spruce, fir, pine, and cedar in the United States, but especially spruce. Spruce timber-beetle, Xyloterus bovitatus, the most injurious of several scolytids which attack the spruce in the United States. Others are Xyloterus (or Xyloterus) celatus, Cryptoporus atomus, Pityophthorus ulmarius, and Hylurgops pinifera.

Tideland spruce, Picea Sitchenis, a spruce found near the mouth of the Columbia river, where for 50 miles in each direction it forms a forest-belt 10 or 15 miles wide. It grows from 140 to 180 feet high, and furnishes an important light, soft, and straight-grained timber, largely manufactured into lumber, and used for construction, inside finish, cooperage, dunnage of vessels, etc. Sargent.

White spruce. (a) Picea alba, the most important timber-tree of subarctic America, extending into northern New England, and at its best in northern Montana. Its timber in commerce is not distinguished from that of the black spruce. Also single spruce. (b) P. Engelmanni, the most valuable timber-tree of the central Rocky Mountain region, where it forms extensive forests. Its wood is of a white or pale-yellow color, light and soft, in Colorado affording lumber, fuel, and charcoal. The bark is rich in tannin, which is locally utilized. (c) P. pungens, a rare and local mountain species of the western United States. Also called blue spruce, Colorado blue spruce. Sargent.

spruce⁴ (sprös), n. An abbreviation of spruce-beer. [Colloq.]

"Come, friend," said Hawk-eye, drawing out a keg from beneath a cover of leaves, . . . "try a little spruce; 'twill . . . quicken the life in your bosom."

J. F. Cooper, Last of the Mohicans, vi.

spruce-beer (sprös'bēr), n. [A partial translation and accommodation (as if 'beer of spruce' or 'beer of spruce' (cf. spruce + beer), or as if spruce beer, i. e. 'beer of spruce' or Prussia (< spruce, or Prussia (see spruce), + beer)] of (i. spruce = li, 'sprouts-beer,' obtained from the young sprouts of the black spruce-fir, < spruce, pl. of pross, a sprout (= li, sprout), + beer = li, beer (see sprout and beer).] A beer made from the leaves and small branches of the spruce-fir, or from the essence of spruce, boiled with sugar or molasses, and fermented with yeast. There are two kinds, the brown and the white, of which the latter is considered the better, as being made with white sugar instead of molasses. spur (spër), n. [< ME. spure, spore, < AS. spora, a spur (hand-spora, 'hand-spur,' talon), = MD. spore, D. spoor, a spur, also a track, = MLG. spore = OHG. sporo, MHG. spore, spor, G. sporn = Icel. spori = Sw. sporre = Dan. spore, spør (cf. OF. esporon, esperon, F. éperon = Pr. espero = OSp. esporon, Sp. espolon = Pg. esporão = It. sperone, sprone (> E. obs. speron), also without the suffix, OSp. espuera, Sp. espuela = Pg. espora, a spur, < OHG. sporo, acc. sporon); orig. 'kicker,' from its use on the heel; from the root of spurn, v. Cf. *speer*¹, spoor, speron, from the same ult. root.] 1. A pointed instrument worn on the heel by a horseman to goad the horse. The earliest medieval spurs were without rowels (see prick-spur, goad-spur); another form had a ball from which a short point projected, and was called the ball-and-spoke spur. The rowel was first introduced in the thirteenth century, but was not common until the beginning of the fourteenth. The spurs of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are sometimes of extraordinary length on account of the projection of the steel flanchers which kept the heel far from the horse's side. See rowel-spur (with cut), also cut under prick-spur.

Wyth-oute spores other spere spakliche he loked.

Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 12.

Mount thou my horse, and hide thy spurs in him,
Till he have brought thee up to yonder troops,
And here again. Shak., J. C., v. 3. 15.

2. Anything which goads, impels, or urges to action; incitement; instigation; incentive; stimulus: used in this sense in the phrase on or upon the spur of the moment—that is, on a momentary impulse; suddenly; hastily; impromptu.

What need we any spur but our own cause
To prick us to redress? Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 123.

If you were my counsel, you would not advise me to answer upon the spur of the moment to a charge which the basest of mankind seem ready to establish by perjury.

Scott, Guy Mannering, lvi.

3. Some projecting thing more or less closely resembling a horseman's spur in form or position. (a) A root of a tree; a large lateral root.

By the spurs pluck'd up

Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 47.

Yet is thy root sincere, sound as the rock,

A quarry of stout spurs and knotted fangs.

Cowper, Yardley Oak, l. 117.

(b) pl. Short small twigs projecting a few inches from the trunk. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] (c) A snag; a spine; specifically, in herpet.: (1) An anal spur. (2) A calcar of some frogs. (d) In cutum, a spine or stiff bristle on the leg. (e) In ornith.: (1) A horny modification of the integument of a bird's foot, forming an outgrowth of the nature of a claw, usually sharp-pointed and supported on a bony core, and used as a weapon of offense and defense; a calcar. Such a spur differs from a claw mainly in not ending a digit, but being an offset from the side of the metatarsus; it is also characteristic of though not confined to the male, and is therefore a secondary sexual character. It is familiar as occurring on the shank of the domestic cock and other gallinaceous birds, and is sometimes double or treble, as in Paro biculcaratus and in the genera Gallipetris, Ithaginis, and Polyplectron. See cuts under calcarate, Gallipetris, Ithaginis, pea-fowl, Polyplectron, Rasores, and trissometatarsus. (2) A similar horny outgrowth on the pinnion-bone of the wing in various birds, resembling a claw, but differing in being a lateral offset not terminating a digit. It occurs in certain geese, plovers, pigeons, and juncos, and is double in the screamer. See cuts under juncos, Palameda, and spur-winged. (f) In sporting, a gall, or sharp piercing or cutting instrument fastened upon the natural spur of a game-cock in the pit. (g) In mammal., the calcar of some bats. (h) In phys. geog., a ridge or line of elevation subordinate to the main body or crest of a mountain-range; one of the lower divisions of a mountain-mass, when this, as is frequently the case, is divided by valleys or gorges. See mountain-chain.

The ground-plan of the latter massif (Mont Blanc) is one long ridge, which, except at the two extremities, preserves a very uniform direction, and throws out a series of long spurs to the north-west.

Bonney, The Alpine Regions, p. 25.

(i) A climbing-iron used in mounting telegraph-poles and the like. (j) In carp., a brace connecting or strengthening a post and some other part, as a rafter or cross-beam. (k) In arch., any offset from a wall, etc., as a buttress; specifically, the claw or griffe projecting from the torus at each of the angles of the base of early pointed medieval columns. (l) In bot., a calcar; a slender hollow projection from some part of a flower, as from the calyx of columbine and larkspur and the corolla of violets. It is usually nectariferous, being the nectary (nectarium) of Linnaeus. The term is also rarely applied to a solid spur-like process. See also cuts under nectary, columbine, and Delphinium. (m) In fort., a wall that crosses a part of the rampart and joins it to an anterior work; also, a tower or blockhouse placed in the outworks before the port. (n) In ship-building: (1) A shore or piece of timber extending from the bilgeways, and fayed and bolted to the bottom of the ship on the stocks. (2) A curved piece of timber serving as a half beam to support the deck where a whole beam cannot be placed. (3) A heavy timber extended from a pier or wharf against the side of a ship to prevent the ship from striking against the pier. (o) In hydraul. engin., a wing-dam, or projection built out from a river-bank to deflect the current. (p) On a casting, a fin, or projection of waste metal. (q) A small piece of refractory clay ware with one or more projecting points, used in a kiln to support or separate articles in a saggar during firing, and to prevent the pieces from adhering to the saggar and to each other. Also called stilt. E. H. Knight.

(r) In an auger, a projecting point on the edge, which makes the circular cut, from which the chip is removed by the lip. E. H. Knight. See cut under auger. (s) The prong on the arms of some forms of patent anchors, for the purpose of catching on the bottom and making the fluke bite or take hold more quickly. See cut under anchor. (t) In printing, a register-point. [Eng.] (u) In anat., the angle at which the arteries leave a cavity or trunk. Dun-glison. (v) In mining, a branch of a vein; a feeder or dropper.—Anal spurs. See anal.—Hot o' the spur. See hot.—Order of the Golden Spur, an old order of the papal court, of which the badge was a Maltese cross with rays between the arms, and having a small spur hanging from it. Having sunk into neglect, it was superseded in 1841 by the Order of St. Sylvester.—Scotch spur, in her., a bearing representing a prick-spur without rowel.—Spur-pepper. See Capicum.—Spur system, in hort., a method of pruning grape-vines in which the ripened wood of the preceding season is cut back close to the old stem or arm, so as to leave spurs bearing one, two, or three buds, the spurs being so selected as to provide for shoots at equal distances. The growing shoots are trained to a position at right angles to the arm, whether this is horizontal or vertical, and are topped after the formation of one, two, or three bunches of grapes upon each.—Spur valerian. See Centranthus. To win one's spurs, to gain a title to knighthood (because spurs were given as a reward for gallant or valiant action); hence, to establish a title to honorable recognition and reward.—With spur and yard, with whip and spur—that is, at once.

spurge† (spërj), v. [< ME. spurgen, spourgen, spourgen, < OF. espurger, espourger = Sp. Pg. espurgar = It. spurgare, < L. expurgare, purge, cleanse; see expurgate, and cf. purge.] I. trans. To purge; cleanse; rid.

Of flies men now hem weyl spourge.

Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, l. 10918.

II. intrans. To purge; froth; emit froth; especially, to work and cleanse itself, as ale.

By reason that . . . the ale and byere haue palled, and were nought by cause such ale and here hathie taken wynde in spurgyn.
Arnold's Chron., p. 85.

spurge² (spërj), n. [< ME. sporgen, spourge, < OF. spurge, espurge, spurge, < OF. espurger, purge; see spurge¹.] A plant of the genus Euphorbia. Several species have special names, chiefly used in books; a few related or similar plants also are called spurges. Exotic species are better known as euphorbia.—Alleghany-mountain spurge. See Pachysandra.—Branched spurge, a rubiaceous shrub, Ernodon littoralis, of the sea-shores of the West Indies and Florida, a prostrate smooth plant with four-angled branches, and yellowish flowers sessile in the upper axils.—Caper-spurge, Euphorbia Lathyrus, a smooth glaucous herb native in southern Europe and western central Asia, cultivated in gardens, thence sometimes escaping. It is singular in the genus for its opposite leaves and for a four-rayed, then forking, umbel. Its young fruit is sometimes substituted for capers, and its seeds contain an oil formerly used in medicine. Also add. caper, moderate, and myrtle-spurge.—Cypress-spurge, a common garden plant, Euphorbia Cyparissias, with tufted stems and yellowish inflorescence, cultivated for its foliage, which consists of crowded linear leaves, and a long, drooping, yellowish inflorescence. It is native of Europe, the eastern world in the eastern United States. Flowering spurge, a conspicuous species, Euphorbia corollata, of eastern North America, a rather slender plant 2 or 3 feet high, with an umbel of about five forks, the rays repeatedly forking into two or three. The involucre has five white appendages appearing like petals. The root has properties similar to those of the spurge. Also (with other species) called milk-weed.—Hyssop-spurge, the purple spurge, Euphorbia Peplis, a European maritime species spreading flat on the sand.—Indian tree-spurge. Same as milk-hedge.—Ipecac-spurge, ipecacuanha-spurge, Euphorbia Ipecacuanha, found in the United States from Connecticut to Florida, a plant with many low stems from a long perpendicular root. The root has an active emetic and purgative property, but in large doses tends to produce excessive nausea and purging, and is inferior to true ipecac. Irish-spurge. See makimibou.—Leafy spurge, Euphorbia Esula, an Old World species resembling the cypress spurge, but larger, with commonly lanceolate leaves.—Myrtle-spurge. See caper-spurge.—Petty spurge, a low branching European species, Euphorbia Peplis.—Purple spurge. See hyssop-spurge.—Sea-spurge, or seaside spurge, Euphorbia Paralias, of European sea-sands.—Slipper-spurge, the slipper-plant. See Pedicularis.—Spotted spurge, a prostrate American species, Euphorbia maculata, with a dark spot on the leaf; also called milk-purslane. The large spotted spurge is E. Preslii, sometimes called black spurge or purslane.—Spurge hawk-moth, a handsome sphinx, Deilephila euphorbia, whose larva feeds on the sea-spurge: an English collectors' name.—Sun-spurge, Euphorbia Helioscopia, an erect annual 6 or 8 inches high, whose flowers follow the sun. Also called cat's-milk, little-god (Scotland), and warthead or wartwort (Prov. Eng.).—Wood-spurge, Euphorbia amygdaloides, of Europe and western Asia.

Flowering Spurge (Euphorbia)

spurging† (spër'jing), n. [Verbal n. of spurge¹, v.] Purging. B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

spur-hawk (spër'häk), n. A dialectal form of sparhawk for sparrow-hawk. [Eng.]

spur-heeled (spër'hëld), a. In ornith., having a very long straightened hind claw; lark-heeled: specifically noting the coucals or cuckoos of the genus Centropus.

spuriæ (spü'ri-ë), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. penæ, feathers) of spurius, spurius; see spurius.] The packet of feathers growing on the bastard wing, winglet, or alula; the bastard quills, composing the alula. See cut under alula.

spurious (spü'ri-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. espurio = It. spurio, < L. spurius, of illegitimate birth, hence in gen. not genuine, false; perhaps akin to Gr. σπυριον, seed, offspring, < σπυριον, sow: see spore².] 1. Not legitimate; bastard: as, spurious issue.

Her spurious first-born. Milton, S. A., l. 391.

2. Not proceeding from the true source or from the source pretended; not being what it pretends or appears to be; not genuine; counterfeit; false; adulterated.

Spurious gems our hopes entice, / While we scorn the pearl of price.
Couper, Self-diffidence (trans.).

3. In zool.: (a) False; resembling a part or organ, but not having its function: as, spurious eyes or limbs. (b) Having the functions of an organ, but morphologically different from it: as, the spurious legs, or prolegs, of a caterpillar.

(c) Aborted or changed so that the normal functions no longer exist: as, the spurious or aborted front legs of certain butterflies. (d) Erroneous; incorrectly established: as, a spurious genus or species. See pseudogenus.—4. In bot., false; counterfeit; apparent only.—Spurious Baltimore, the orchard-oriole, Icterus spurius, formerly supposed to be a variety of the Baltimore oriole. Also called bastard Baltimore.—Spurious claw, in entom., same as empodium.—Spurious dissipation, in bot., a partition in an ovary or pericarp not formed by parts of the carpels, but by an outgrowth commonly from the back of the carpel. See dissipation.—Spurious hermaphrodites. See hermaphrodite, 1.—Spurious ocellus, a circular spot of color without any well-defined central spot or pupil.—Spurious pareira. See pareira.—Spurious primary, in ornith., the first or outermost primary or remex of a bird's wing which has at least ten primaries and the first one very short, rudimentary, or functionless. Also called spurius quill.—Spurious proposition, rainbow, stemma, etc. See the nouns.—Spurious sarsaparilla. See Hardenbergia.—Spurious vein, in entom., a faintly indicated vein or nervure of the wing, traceable only by a strong reflected light, particularly of certain hymenoptera.—Spurious wing, in ornith., the ala spuria, or bastard wing; the alula. See spuria, and cut under alula. [This use of spurious has no reference to the condition of a first primary so called. See above.]—Syn. 2. Spurious, Supposititious, and Counterfeit in expressing intent to deceive, except that counterfeit may be used with figurative lightness where no dishonorable purpose is implied. Spurious, not genuine, expresses strong disapprobation of the deception, successful or attempted. Supposititious applies only to that which is substituted for the genuine; it thus expresses a class under the spurious: a supposititious work of Athanasius is not one that is supposed to have been written by him, but one that is palmed off upon the public as being the genuine text of a work that he is known to have written; a supposititious child is a changeling; was the Tichborne claimant the genuine or a supposititious Sir Roger? Counterfeit applies also to a class under the spurious—namely, to that which is made in attempted imitation of something else: as, a counterfeit coin, bank-note, signature. Chatterton's manuscripts were spurious, but not supposititious; as they were not exact imitations of any particular manuscripts of early days, they would hardly be called counterfeit. See facticious.

spuriously (spü'ri-us-li), adv. In a spurious manner; counterfeitedly; falsely.

spuriousness (spü'ri-us-nes), n. 1. Illegitimacy; the state of being bastard, or not of legitimate birth: as, spuriousness of issue.—2. The state or quality of being spurious, counterfeit, false, or not genuine: as, the spuriousness of drugs, of coin, or of writings.

spur-leather (spër'leth'ër), n. A strap by which a spur is secured to the foot.

I could eat my very spur-leathers for anger!

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

spur-legged (spër'leg'ed or -legd), a. Having spurs or spines on the legs or feet. The Leptidæ are known as spur-legged flies.

spurless (spër'les), a. [< spur + -less.] Without a spur, in any sense.

spurling (spër'ling), n. A spelling of sparling.

spurling-line (spër'ling-lin), n. Naut.: (a) A line connected with the axis of a wheel by which a telltale or index is made to show the position of the helm. (b) A rope stretched across between the two forward shrouds, having thimbles spliced into it to serve as fair-leadings for the running rigging.

spur-money† (spër'mun'i), n. Money exacted for wearing spurs in church. See the quotation.

*Our cathedrals (and above all St. Paul's) were, in Jonson's time, frequented by people of all descriptions, who, with a levity scarcely credible, walked up and down the aisles, and transacted business of every kind, during divine service. To expel them was not possible; such, however, was the noise occasioned by the incessant jingling of their spur-rowels, that it was found expedient to punish those who approached the body of the church, thus indecently equipped, by a small fine, under the name of spur-money, the exaction of which was committed to the headles and singing boys.*

spurn¹ (spërñ), v. [*< ME. spurnen, spornen, < AS. speornan, *spornan, ge-speornan, ge-spornan, spurnan, in Somner, not authenticated, also in comp. æt-speornan, æt-spornan (pret. spearn, pl. spurnon, pp. spornen) = OS. spurnan = OHG. spurnan = Icel. sporna, spyrna, also spærna, kick against, spurn with the feet, = L. spernere, despise; ult. connected with spur.] I. trans. 1. To kick against; kick; drive back or away with the foot.

And Galashin with his fote spurned his body to grounde.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 199.

Martinus Scriblerus, i. 8.

3†. To dash; rush.—4. To manifest disdain or contempt in rejecting anything; make contemptuous opposition; manifest contempt or disdain in resistance.

It is very sure that they that be good will bear, and not spurn at the preachers.

Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Thou art regardless both of good and shame,
Spurning at virtue and a virtuous name.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 3.

spurn¹ (spɜrn), n. [< ME. spurn, sporn; < spurn¹, v.] 1. A blow with the foot; a kick.

He tosse that heele a yard above his head

That offers but a spurne.

Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 31).

2†. A stumble; a fall. Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 19.—3. Disdainful rejection; contemptuous treatment.

The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1. 73.

When there's so many squab ones in the nest?
W. King, The Old Cheese.

Hence—4. Shy, as from extreme youth; coy.

Your demure ladies that are so squab in company are devils in a corner.

N. Lee, Princess of Cleve, iii. i. (Encyc. Diet.)

II. n. 1. A young animal in its earliest period; a young beast or bird before the hair or feathers appear. (a) Specifically, a young unfledged pigeon or dove. A young pigeon is properly a squab as long as it sits in the nest; as soon as it can utter its querulous cries for food it becomes a squealer or squeaker, and so continues as long as it is fed by the parents, which is generally until it is fully fledged; but it continues to be called squab as marketable for its flesh. (b) Figuratively, a young and inexperienced person.

Brit. I warrant you, is he a trim youth?

Mon. We must make him one, Jacke; 'tis such a squab as thou never sawest; such a lump, we may make what we will of him.

Brome, Sparagus Garden, ii. 2.

2. A short, fat, flabby person; also used figuratively.

*Gorgonius sits, abdominous and wan,
Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan.*

Comper, Progress of Error, i. 218.

We shall then see how the prudes of this world owed all their fine figure only to their being a little straiter laced, and that they were naturally as arrant squabs as those that went more loose.

Pope, To Lady M. W. Montagu, Aug. 18, 1716.

3. (a) A thickly stuffed cushion, especially one for a piece of furniture, as an upholstered chair or sofa, to which it may or may not be attached. Hence—(b) A sofa in which there is no part of the frame visible, and which is stuffed and caught through with strong thread at regular intervals, but so as to be very soft.

Bessie herself lay on a squab, or short sofa, placed under the window.

Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xiii.

(c) An ottoman.

I have seen a folio writer place himself in an elbow-chair, when the author of duodecimo has, out of a just deference to his superior quality, seated himself upon a squab.

Addison, Spectator, No. 529.

squab² (skwob'), v. t.; pret. and pp. squabbed, ppr. squabbling. [< squab², n.] To stuff thickly and catch through with thread at regular intervals, as a cushion. A button or soft tuft is usually placed in the depressions to hide the stitches. Furniture upholstered in this manner is said to be squabbed.

squabash (skwa-bash'), v. t. [Appar. an arbitrary formation, or an extension of squab¹.] To crush; squash; quash; also used as a noun. [Slang.]

His (Gifford's) satire of the Baviad and Maviad squabashed, at one blow, a set of coxcombs who might have humbugged the world long enough.

Scott, Diary, Jan. 17, 1827. (Lockhart)

squabbish (skwob'ish'), a. [< squab² + -ish.] Thick; fat; heavy.

Diet renders them of a squabbish or lardy habit of body.

Harvey.

squabble (skwob'l'), v.; pret. and pp. squabbled, ppr. squabbling. [< Sw. dial. skrabbla, dispute (skrabbel, a dispute), freq. of skrappa, chide, lit. make a splashing. < skrapp, a splash: see scab, swab.] I. intrans. To engage in a noisy quarrel or row; wrangle; quarrel and fight noisily; brawl; scuffle.

Drunk? and speak parrot? and squabble? swagger? swear?

Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 279.

We should squabble like Brother and Sister.

Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

=Syn. To jangle. See quarrel, n.

II. trans. In printing, to disarrange and mix (lines of composed types) when they are standing on their feet.

The letters do not range well, giving an irregular or squabbled appearance to the line.

Science, VIII. 254.

squabble (skwob'l'), n. [< Sw. dial. skrabbel, a dispute; from the verb.] A wrangle; a dispute; a brawl; a scuffle; a noisy quarrel.

Pragmatic fools commonly begin the squabble, and crafty knaves reap the benefit.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

This contrariety of humours betwixt my father and my uncle was the source of many a fraternal squabble.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, i. 21.

=Syn. Brawl, Wrangle, etc. See quarrel.

squabbl (skwob'lér'), n. [< squabble + -er¹.]

One who squabbles; a contentious person; a brawler; a noisy disputant.

squabby (skwob'i'), a. [< squab² + -y¹.] Thick; resembling a squab; squat.

A French woman is a perfect architect in dress; . . . she never tricks out a squabby Doric shape with Corinthian finery.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

squab-chick (skwob'chik'), n. A chick, or young chicken, not fully feathered; a fledgling. [Prov. Eng.] squab-pie (skwob'pī'), n. 1. A pie made of squabs; pigeon-pie.—2. A pie made of fat mutton well peppered and salted, with layers of apple and an onion or two. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

Cornwall squab-pye, and Devon white-pot brings;

And Leicester beans and bacon, food of kings!

W. King, Art of Cookery, i. 105.

squacco (skwak'ō'), n. [A native name, prob. imitative (cf. quack¹, quail³).] A small rail-like heron of Europe, Asia, and Africa, Ardea or Ardeola commata, ralloides, castanea, or squatilla, of a white color, much varied with chestnut or russet-brown and black. The head is crested, with six long black and white plumes; the bill is cobalt-blue, tipped with black; the lores are emerald-green; the feet flesh-colored, with yellow soles and black claws; and the irides pale-yellow. The squacco nests in heronries, usually on a tree, and lays four to six greenish-blue eggs. It is rare in Europe north of the Mediterranean basin, but common in most parts of Africa, and extends into a small part of Asia.

Squacco (Ardeola commata)

squad¹ (skwod'), n. [(OF.) vernacular esquarre, esquare, > ME. square < OF. esquadra, escadre, F. esentre = Sp. esquadra = Pg. esquadra, < It. squadra, a squad, squadron, square: see square¹, and cf. squadron.] 1. Major Downing, May-Day. (Bartlett.)

squadron (skwod'ron'), n. [= D. escadron = Dan. eskadron, < OF. esquadron, F. escadron = Sp. escuadron = Pg. esquadrao (= G. schwadron = Sw. squadron), < It. squadrone, a squadron, aug. of squadra, a squad, a square: see square¹, square¹.] 1. A square.

Six days journey from Bezeneger is the place where they get Diamants; . . . it is a great place, compassed with a wall, and . . . they sell the earth within the wall for so much a squadron, and the limits are set how deepe or how low they shall digge.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 221.

2. A body of soldiers drawn up in a square, or in regular array, as for battle; specifically, in modern armies, the principal division of a regiment of cavalry. This corresponds more or less closely to a company in the infantry, and consists of two troops, each commanded by a captain. The actual strength of a squadron varies from 120 to 200 men.

The Ordovices, to welcome the new General, had hew'n in peeces a whole Squadron of Horse.

Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

3. A division of a fleet; a detachment of ships of war employed on a particular service or station, and under the command of a flag-officer.

—4. Generally, any ranked and orderly body or group.—5. In early New England records (1636), one of four divisions of town land, probably in the first instance a square. The records show that squadron was used later in other senses: (a) A division of a town for highway care.

Agreed upon by the selectmen for the . . . calling out of their men to work, that is within their several squadrans.

Town Records, Groton, Mass., 1671.

(b) A school district.

Voted and chose a committee of seven men to apportion the school in six societies or squadrans, . . . taking the northwesterly corner for one squadron.

Town Records, Marlborough, Mass., 1749.

Sometimes spelled squadrant.

squadron (skwod'ron'), v. t. [< squadron, n.]

1. To form into squadrans, as a body of soldiers. Hence—2. To form in order; array.

squaimoust, a. See squaramous.

squaint, n. An obsolete dialectal form of swain.

squalder (skwol'dér'), n. A kind of jelly-fish. See the quotation.

I have oftentimes mett with two other entites which seeme to bee of a congenerous substance with the afore-named gellies, both of them to bee found in the salt water. One is flat and round, as broad as a mans palme, or broader, and as thick as the hand, cleare and transparent, convex on one side and somewhat like the gibbous part of the human liver, on the other side concave with a contrivance like a knot in the very middle thereof, but plainly with circular fibers about the verge or edge of it (where it is growne thin) which suffer manifest constriction and dilatation, which doe promote its natation, which is also perceptible, and by which you may discerne it to advance towards the shore, or recede from it. About us they are generally called squalders, but are indeed evidently fishes, although not described in any Ichthyology I have yet mett with.

Dr. R. Robinson, To Sir T. Browne, Dec. 12, 1659 (in Sir T. Browne's Works, I. 423).

squale, n. and v. See squail.

Squali (skwā'li'), n. pl. [NL. (Müller, 1835), pl. of L. squalus, a shark: see Squalus.] In ichth., a section of elasmobranchiate fishes, or selachians, having the gill-slits lateral and plural, five, six, or seven in number; the sharks proper, as distinguished from the *Raie*s (rays or skates, with ventral gill-slits) and from the Holocephali (chimeras, with gill-slits a single pair). The name has been used for groups of various extent; it is now generally restricted to the plagiostomous fishes with lateral branchial apertures and the pectoral fins regularly curved backward from the base of insertion. The Squali are divided into about 12 families and many genera, the nomenclature of which is by no means fixed. See Selachii and shark¹, and cuts under selachians and dofish.

squalid (skwol'id'), a. [< L. squalidus, foul, filthy, < squalere, be stiff, rough, or dry (with squall (skwāl), n. [< Sw. squäl, a rush of water (squäl-regn), a violent shower of rain, a squall (= Norw. skval, a gushing, rippling, rinse-water; cf. Dan. skyl, also skyl-regn, a violent shower of rain); < squala, dial. skvala, skvala, gush out, = Norw. skvala, gush out, splash, ripple; also in secondary forms, Norw. skvelja, gush, splash; Norw. skola, wash, gush, = Icel. skola, wash; Icel. skyla = Norw. skyla = Dan. skylle, wash. The word is generally assumed to be connected with squall.] A sudden and violent gust of wind, or a succession of such gusts, usually accompanied by rain, snow, or sleet. In a ship's log-book abbreviated sq.

Squalius (skwāl'i-us), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1847), < L. squalus, a shark. The European dace was at one time called, for no obvious reason, Squalus minor.] A genus of small cyprinoid fishes, many of which are known as dace. The type is the European dace, Cyprinus leuciscus of the Linnaean system now called Squalius laietanus or leuciscus vulgaris. Numerous American species fall in this genus and are loosely known as minnows, shiners, chubs, mudlets, etc. See cut under dace.

A lowering squall obscures the southern sky.
—Falconer, Shipwreck, ii. 145.

No gladlier does the stranded wreck
See thro' the gray skirts of a lifting squall
The boat that bears the hope of life approach.
—Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

Arched squall, a remarkable squall occurring near the equator, in which a mass of black clouds collects and rapidly rises, forming a vast arch, or ring-shaped bed of cloud. The ring of cloud enlarges, and above it masses of cloud rise higher and higher until they reach the zenith. Then usually, though not invariably, a violent thunder-storm breaks forth, with vivid zigzag lightning, deafening peals of thunder, and torrents of rain, lasting, perhaps, for half an hour. The phenomenon varies in its details in different seas, but occurs most frequently and on the grandest scale in the southern part of the China Sea, the Gulf of Siam, the Sulu Sea, and particularly in the Straits of Malacca. — Black squall, a squall attended with a specially dark cloud. — Bull's-eye squall, a white squall of great violence on the west coast of Africa. — Heavy squall, a squall in which the wind blows with much force. — Line-squall, a squall accompanying the passage of the trough of a V-shaped barometric depression: so named because the squalls form a line coincident with the axis of the trough, which sweeps across the country, broadside on, with the progressive motion of the depression. — Thick squall, a squall in which the rain or snow obscures the view. — To look out for squalls, to be on one's guard; to be on the watch against trouble or danger. [Colloq.] — White squall, a whirlwind of small radius arising suddenly in fair weather without the usual formation of clouds. The only indication of its development is the boiling of the sea beneath the current of ascending air around which the rapid gyrations take place, together with a patch of white cloud, generally formed above it at the level of condensation. These are also the conditions of a waterspout, which may or may not be completely formed, according to the energy of the whirl and the amount of vapor in the atmosphere. White squalls are infrequent, and rarely occur outside of the tropics; in general they are dangerous only to sailing vessels and small craft.

Syn. Galbete. See wind.

squall¹ (skwāl), v. i. [< *squall*¹, n.] To blow a squall: used chiefly impersonally: as, it squalled terribly. [Colloq.]

And the quarter-deck tarpauling

Was shivered in the squalling.

—Thackeray, The White Squall.

squall² (skwāl), v. [Early mod. E. also squawl; < Icel. squala, scream. = Sw. dial. skvala, skvala, cry out, chatter, = Dan. (freq.) skvaldre, clamor; cf. Icel. skella (pret. skall), resound, = G. schallen, resound (see scold); cf. Sc. squalloch, skel-loch, cry shrilly, Gael. skall, howl. Cf. *squall*¹, and see squall.] 1. Intrans. To cry out; scream or cry violently, as a frightened woman or a child in anger or distress: used in contempt or dislike.

You can laugh, and squall, and romp in full security.
—Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

"Send that squalling little brat about his business, and do what I bid ye, sir," says the Doctor.
—Thackeray, Henry Esmond, iii. 5.

II. trans. To utter in a discordant, screaming tone.

And pray, what are your Town Diversions? To hear a parcel of Italian Lurches, like so many Cats, squall out somewhat you don't understand.

—Tunbridge Walks, in Ashton's Queen Anne, i. 328.

squall² (skwāl), n. [< *squall*², v.] A harsh cry; a loud and discordant scream; a sound intermediate in character between a squawk and a squeal.

There oft are heard the notes of infant woe,
The short thick sob, loud scream, and shriller squall.

—Pope, Imit. of Spenser, The Alley.

squall³ (skwāl), n. [Perhaps a particular use of *squall*².] A baby; pet; minx; girl; used vaguely, in endearment or reproach.

A pretty, beautiful, juicy squall.
—Middleton, Michaelmas Term, i. 2.

The rich gull gallant call's her deare and love, Ducke, lambe, squall, sweet-heart, cony, and his dove.

—Taylor's Works (1630).

squaller (skwāl'ler), n. [< *squall*² + -er.] One who squalls; one who shrieks or cries aloud.

squally¹ (skwāl'i), a. [< *squall*¹ + -y.] 1. Abounding with squalls; disturbed often with sudden and violent gusts of wind: as, squally weather. — 2. Threatening; ominous: as, things began to look squally. [Colloq.]

squally² (skwāl'i), a. [Perhaps a dial. var. of *squally*¹.] 1. Having unproductive spots interspersed throughout: said of a field of turnips or corn. [Prov. Eng.] — 2. Badly woven; showing knots in the thread or irregularities in the weaving: said of a textile fabric.

squaloid (skwāl'oid), a. [< NL. Squalus + Gr. oides, form.] Like a shark of the genus Squalus: selachian or plagiostomous, as a true shark; of or pertaining to the Squalidæ; squaliform.

squalor (skwāl'or or skwāl'lor), n. [< L. squalor, roughness, filth, < squalere, be stiff or rough, as with dirt; see squalid.] Foulness; filthiness; coarseness.

Nastiness, squalor, ugliness, hunger. — Burton.

Squalor carceris, in Scots law, the strictness of imprisonment which a creditor is entitled to enforce, in order to compel the debtor to pay the debt, or disclose funds he may have concealed.

Squalus (skwāl'us), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < L. squalus, a kind of sea-fish.] A genus founded by Linnaeus, including all the sharks and shark-like selachians known to him (15 species in 1766). See Acanthias, and cut under dogfish.

squam (skwom), n. [< Annisquam, a fishing-hamlet in Massachusetts.] An oilskin hat worn originally by fishermen and deep-water sailors; a cheap yellow sou'wester. [U. S.]

squama (skwā'mā), n.; pl. squamæ (-mē). [NL., < L. squama, a scale; see squame.] 1. In bot., a scale of any sort, usually the homologue of a leaf. — 2. In anat. and zool.: (a) A scale, as of the epidermis. (b) A thin, expansive, scale-like part of a bone: as, the squama of the temporal bone (the squamosal); the squama of the occipital bone (the supra-occipital). — 3. In ornith., a scale-like feather, as one of those upon a penguin's wing or the throat of a humming-bird. See cut under Squamipennes. — 4. In entom., an elytrum. — Squama frontalis, the vertical part of the frontal bone. — Squama occipitis, the thin expanded part of the occipital bone; the supra-occipital. — Squama temporalis, the thin shell-like part, or the squamous portion, of the temporal bone.

squamaceous (skwā-mā'shius), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + -aceous.] Same as squamous or squamosæ.

Squamata (skwā-mā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. squamatus, scaly: see squamate.] 1. In herpet., the scaly reptiles. (a) An order of Reptilia, established by Oepel in 1811. It was composed of the saurians or lizards (including crocodiles) and snakes or ophidians, divided accordingly into Saurii and Ophidii. Its contents were the modern orders Crocodylia, Lacertilia, and Ophidia, with, however, one foreign element (Amphisbæna). (b) In Merrem's system of classification (1820), same as Oepel's Squamata exclusive of the crocodiles, or Loricata of Merrem. It formed the third order of Pholidota or scaly reptiles, divided into Gradientia, Reptentia, Serpentia, Incedentia, and Preidentia. Also called Lepidosauria, and formerly Saurophidia.

2. In mammal., scaly mammals; a group of the Entomophaga or insectivorous edentates, containing the single family Manidæ, the scaly ant-eaters, or pangolins, in which the body is squamated, being covered with horny overlapping scales. The group is now usually ranked as a suborder.

squamate (skwā'mat), a. [< L. squamatus, scaly, < L. squama, a scale: see squama.] 1. In zool., scaly: covered with scales or squame; squamose or squamigerous; specifically, of or pertaining to the Squamata, in any sense. — 2. In anat., scale-like; forming or formed like a scale; squamous or squamiform: as, a squamate bone; squamate scales of cuticle. — 3. In bot., same as squamosæ.

squamated (skwā'mat-ed), a. [< squamate + -ed.] Same as squamate.

squamation (skwā-mā'shon), n. [< squamate + -ion.] In zool., the state or character of being squamate, squamose, or scaly; the collection or formation of scales or squamæ of an animal: as, the squamation of a lizard, snake, or pangolin. Compare desquamation.

squam-duck (skwom'duk), n. See *duck*².

squame (skwām), n. [< ME. squame, < L. squama, a scale (of a fish, serpent, etc.), a scale (of metal), scale-armor, a cataract in the eye, hull of millet, etc., LL. fig. roughness; prob. akin to squalere, be stiff or rough: see squalid.] 1. A thin layer; a scale.

Orpiment, brent bones, yren squames.
—Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 206.

2. In zool., a scale or squame. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 172.

squamella (skwā-mel'ä), n.; pl. squamellæ (-ë). [NL., dim. of L. squama, a scale: see squama.] 1. In bot., same as squamula. 2. — 2. [cap.] In zool., a genus of zygotrochous rotifers, of the family Euchlanidæ.

squamellate (skwā-mel'ät), a. [< NL. squamellatus*, < squamella, q. v.] Same as squamulate.

squamelliferous (skwam-e-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. squamella, a little scale, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., furnished with or bearing squamellæ.

Squamifera (skwā-mif'e-rä), n. pl. [NL., < F. Squamifères (De Blainville, 1816), < L. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] Squamous or scaly reptiles; Reptilia proper, as distinguished from Nudipellifera or Amphibia; also called Ornithoides.

squamiferous (skwā-mif'e-rus), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Provided with squamæ or scales; squamate; squamigerous. — 2. In bot., bearing scales: as, a squamiferous catkin.

squamiflorous (skwā-mi-flō-rus), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + flos (flor-), flower.] In bot., having flowers like scales; also, having scales bearing flowers, as in the Conifera.

squamiform (skwā-mi-fōrm), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + forma, form.] Having the shape, character, or appearance of a scale; squamate in form or structure; scale-like.

squamigerous (skwā-mij'e-rus), a. [< L. squamiger, scale-bearing, < squama, a scale, + gerere, bear, carry.] Provided with squamæ; squamose; squamiferous.

squamipen (skwā-mi-pen), n. Any fish of the group Squamipennes or Squamipinnes.

squamipennate (skwā-mi-pen'ät), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing: see pennate.] Having scaly feathers, as a penguin.

Squamipennes (skwā-mi-pen'ez), n. pl. [NL., < L. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing, fin: see pennæ.] 1. In ichth., same as Squamipinnes. — 2. In ornith., the penguins, or Sphenisci: so called from the scale-like character of the plumage. [Rare.]

Squamipinnes (skwā-mi-pin'ez), n. pl. [NL. (Cuvier, spelled Squamipinnes): see Squamipennes.] In ichth.: (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the sixth family of acanthopterygian fishes: so called because the soft and frequently the spinous parts of their dorsal and anal fins are covered with scales, which render it difficult to distinguish them from the body. The body is generally much compressed; the intestines are long, and the cæca numerous. The group included the families Chetodontidæ, Ephippidæ, Zanclidæ, Scatoph- gidae, Platacidæ, Psettidae, Pineleptidae, Bramidae, Pempherididae, and Toxotidae. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Leanthopterygii perciformes, nearly the same as (a), but without the Zanclidae, Platacidæ, Psettidae, Bramidae, Pempherididae, and typical Pineleptidae.

Squamipennes. — Scaly feather from anterior edge of wing of penguin (Aptenodytes longirostris), enlarged 8 times.

squamoid (skwā'moid), a. [L. squama, a scale, + Gr. eidos, form.] 1. Resembling a squama; squamiform; scale-like.—2. Squamous; scaly; squamate.

squamomandibular (skwā'mō-man-dib'ū-lār), a. [L. squamo(us) + mandibular.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and the mandible, or lower jaw-bone; as, the squamomandibular articulation, characteristic of mammals. In human anatomy this joint is commonly called temporomaxillary.

squamomastoid (skwā'mō-mas'toid), a. [L. squamo(us) + mastoid.] Of or pertaining to the squamous and mastoid elements of the temporal bone; as, a squamomastoid ankylosis.

squamoparietal (skwā'mō-pā-rī'e-tal), a. [L. squamo(us) + parietal.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and parietal bones; as, the squamoparietal suture, shortly called squamous.

squamopetrosal (skwā'mō-pe-trō'sal), a. [L. squamo(us) + petrosal.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and petrosal elements of the temporal bone; as, squamopetrosal ankylosis.

squamosal (skwā'mō'sal), a. and n. [L. squamosa + -al.] 1. A scale-like or squamous; noting only the squamosal. See II.

II. n. In zool. and anat., the squamous division of the temporal bone; the thin, expansive, scale-like element of the compound temporal bone; a membrane-bone, morphologically distinct from other parts of the temporal, filling a gap in the cranial walls, articulating in man and mammals with the lower jaw, in birds and reptiles with the suspensorium (quadrate bone) of the lower jaw, effecting squamous suture with various cranial bones, and forming by its zygomatic process in mammals a part of the zygoma, or jugal bar. It is remarkably expansive in man. See cuts under Acipenser, Acrodont, Bale-nula, Craniofacial, Crotalus, Cyclopus, Felidae, Galline, Ichthyosauria, Ophidiu, Physeter, Pythonidae, Rana, and Skull.

squamosa (skwā'mō's), a. [L. squamosus, full of scales, covered with scales, L. squama, a scale; see squame.] 1. In bot., scaly; furnished with small appressed scales or squamæ; also, scale-like. Also squamate, squamous.—2. In zool., squamous; squamiferous or squamigerous; covered with scales; scaly; specifically, in entom., covered with minute scales, as the wings of lepidopterous insects; lepidopterous; squamulate.

squamosphenoidal (skwā'mō-sfē-noi'dal), a. [L. squamo(us) + sphenoidal.] Pertaining to the squamous part of the temporal bone and the sphenoid bone; as, the squamosphenoidal suture. Also squamosphenoid.

squamosetemporal (skwā'mō-tem'pō-ral), a. [L. squamo(us) + temporal.] Squamosal, as a part of the temporal bone. Owen.

squamotympanic (skwā'mō-tim-pan'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the squamosal and tympanic bones; as, a squamotympanic ankylosis.

squamous (skwā'mus), a. [L. squamosus, covered with scales; see squamosa.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) Covered with scales; scaly; squamate; squamosa; squamiferous or squamigerous. (b) Scale-like; squamoid; squamiform; specifically, of a bone, same as squamosal.—2. In bot., same as squamosa.—Squamous bone, the squamosal.—Squamous bulb, in bot., a bulb in which the outer scales are distinct, fleshy, and imbricated; a scaly bulb. See bulb.—Squamous cells, flattened, dry, thin cells, as seen in the superficial layers of the epidermis.—Squamous epithelium, epithelium composed of thin scale-like cells, either in a single layer (tessellated epithelium) or in several layers (stratified scaly epithelium). See epithelium.—Squamous portion of the temporal bone, the squamosal: opposed to petrosal and mastoid portions of the same compound bone.—Squamous suture, in anat., a fixed articulation or synarthrosis, in which the thin beveled edge of a squamous bone overlaps another; specifically, the squamoparietal suture and squamosphenoidal suture, those by which the squamosal articulates with the parietal and alisphenoidal bones respectively. See cut under parietal.

squamozygomatic (skwā'mō-zī-gō-mat'ik), a. and n. [L. squamo(us) + zygomatic.] 1. a. In anat., noting the squamous and zygomatic parts of the temporal bone; as, a squamozygomatic center of ossification.

II. n. A squamozygomatic bone; the squamosal together with its zygomatic process.

squamula (skwām'ū-lā), a. [pl. squamulae (-lē). L., dim. of squama, a scale; see squame.] 1.

A little scale. Specifically, in entom.: (a) One of the flattened scale-like hairs or processes which in many cases clothe the lower surfaces of the tarsal joints. (b) The tegula or scale covering the base of the anterior wing of a hymenopterous insect.

2. In bot.: (a) A scale of secondary order or reduced size. (b) Same as lodicule. Also squamella.

Also squamule.

squamulate (skwām'ū-lāt), a. [*L. squamu-latus, L. squamula, a little scale; see squamule.] Having little scales; covered with squamules; minutely scaly or squamose. Also squamellate, squamulose.

squamule (skwām'ūl), n. [L. squamula, a little scale, dim. of squama, a scale; see squame.] In bot. and zool., same as squamula.

squamuliform (skwām'ū-li-fōrm), a. [L. squamula, a little scale, + forma, form.] Having the form or character of a squamule.

squamulose (skwām'ū-lōs), a. [*L. squamu-losus, L. squamula, a little scale; see squamule.] Same as squamulate.

squander (skwōn'dēr), v. [Not found in early use; perhaps a dial. form, a variant, with the common dial. change of initial sw- to sq-, of swander*, which is perhaps a nasalized form of swadder*, orig. scatter as water (?) (cf. MD. swadden, dabble in water, = Sw. dial. skvadra, gush out, as water), itself a variant of E. dial. swatter, Sc. squatter, throw (water) about, scatter, squander, < Sw. dial. squättra, squander; freq. of E. dial. swat, var. swat, throw down forcibly; cf. Icel. skvætta = Sw. skvätta, throw out, squirt, = Dan. skvätte, squirt, splash, squander; see squat, squatter, swat, swatter. The word may owe its nasalization to AS. swindan (pret. swand), vanish, waste, OHG. swantian, G. ver-schwenden, squander, etc.] I. trans. 1. To scatter; disperse. [Archaic.]

Other ventures he hath, squandered abroad.

Shak. M. of V., i. 3. 22.

They drive and squander the huge Belgian fleet.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 67.

The fallen timber obstructed the streams, the rivers were squandered in the reedy morasses.

C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 223.

2. To spend lavishly, profusely, or prodigally; dissipate; use without economy or judgment; lavish; as, to squander one's money or an estate.

How much time is squandered away in Vanity and Folly?

Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. x.

Is he not a gay, dissipated rake, who has squandered his patrimony?

Sheridan, The Duenna, ii. 3.

II. intrans. 1. To disperse; wander aimlessly; go at random. [Archaic.]

The wise man's folly is anatomized

Even by the squandering glances of the fool.

Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 57.

2. To waste one's substance; go to wasteful expense; spend recklessly.

He was grown needy by squandering upon his vices.

Swift, Change in Queen's Ministry.

squander (skwōn'dēr), n. [L. squander, v.] The act of squandering. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

squanderer (skwōn'dēr-ēr), n. [L. squander + -er.] One who squanders; one who spends his money prodigally; a spendthrift; a prodigal; a waster; a lavisher.

I say he is an unthrift, a Squanderer, and must not expect supplies from me. Brome, Sparagus Garden, iii. 5.

squanderingly (skwōn'dēr-ing-lī), adv. In a squandering manner; by squandering; prodigally; lavishly. Imp. Dict.

squand-fish (skwōn'fish), n. A cyprinoid fish, Ptychochilus lucius. See pike, n., 2 (a).

squander-squash (skwōn'tēr-skwoš), n. Same as squash. See the quotation.

Yet the clypeate are sometimes called cymnals (as are some others also) from the lenten cake of that name, which many of them very much resemble. Squash, or squander-squash, is their name among the northern Indians, and so they are called in New York and New England.

Beverley, Hist. Virginia, iv. 19.

squap (skwop), v. [A dial. var. of swap.] To strike. [Prov. Eng.]

squap (skwop), n. [L. squap, v.] A blow. [Prov. Eng.]

squarable (skwār'ā-bl), a. [L. square + -able.] In math., capable of being squared. Hutton's Recreations, p. 169.

square (skwār), n. [Formerly also (esp. in def. 5) squire, squier; < ME. square, squar, square, sware, a square, squire, squyre, squyger, a carpenter's square, < OF. esquare, esquarre, escairre, esquierre, esquire, a square, squareness, F. équerre = Sp. escuadra, a square, squad, squadron, = Pg. esquadra, a squadron, esquadria, a square, a rule, esquadro, a right angle

Cf. square, a.] 1. In geom., a four-sided plane rectilinear figure, having all its sides equal, and all its angles right angles.

I have a parlour
Of a great square, and height as you desire it.
Tomkis (?), Albumazar, ii. 3.

The hard-grained Muses of the cube and square.
Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

2. A figure or object which nearly approaches this shape; a square piece or part, or a square surface: as, a square of glass.

A third court, to make a square with the front, but not to be built, nor yet enclosed with a naked wall.
Bacon, Building (ed. 1887).

He bolted his food down his capacious throat in squares of 3 inches.
Scott.

The casement slowly grows a glimmering square.
Tennyson, Princess, iv. (song).

Specifically—(a) In printing, a certain number of lines forming a part of a column nearly square: used chiefly in reckoning the prices of newspaper advertisements. (b) A square piece of linen, cloth, or silk, usually decorated with embroidery, fringe, or lace: as, a table-square.

3. A quadrilateral area, rectangular or nearly so, with buildings, or sites for buildings, on every side; also, an open space formed by the intersection of streets; hence, such an area planted with trees, shrubs, or grass, and open to the public for recreation or diversion; a public park among buildings; a common; a green: as, Union Square in New York; Lafayette Square in Washington; Trafalgar Square in London.

The statue of Alexander the Seventh stands in the large square of the town.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 401).

4. An area bounded by four streets; a block: as, the house is four or five squares further up-town.

—5. An instrument used by artificers, draftsmen, and others for trying or describing right angles. It consists of two rules or branches fastened perpendicularly at one end of their extremities so as to a., carpenter's square of iron or steel; b., draftsman's T-square of wood, b' having a head adjustable at any angle; c., bevel square, the blade of which can be set either square or at any angle; d., center square; e., center square; f., carpenter's try square; g., square with adjustable heads and with vernier scale for measuring diameters, also called vernier calipers.

form a right angle. Sometimes one of the branches is pivoted, so as to admit of measuring other than right angles. When one rule is joined to the other in the middle in the form of a T, it is called a T-square.

Thou shalt me fynde as just as is a square.

Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 388.

Of all kyne craftes ich contreeuede here tooles,
Of carpentrie, of keruers, and contreeuede the compas,
And cast out by square both lyne and leuell.

Piers Plowman (C), xii. 127.

A poet does not work by square or line,
As smiths and joiners perfect a design.

Cowper, Conversation, l. 789.

Hence—6. A true measure, standard, or pattern.

This cause I'll argue,
And be a peace between ye, if 't so please you, louder to my ears than the catarrh of Niagara.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, ii. 7.

Lemon squash. See lemon-squash.

squash² (skwosh'), n. [An abbr. of squattersquash, squatter-squash, < Amer. Ind. askuta-squash, askush, pl. of usq, raw, green.] The fruit of an annual plant of the gourd kind, belonging to one of several species of the genus Cucurbita; also, the plant itself. The very numerous and divergent varieties of the cultivated squash are reduced by good authority to three species: C. maxima, the great or winter squash; C. Pepo, including the pumpkin and also a large part of the ordinary squashes; and C. moschata, the musky, China, or Barbary squash. The last has a club-shaped, pear-shaped, or long cylindrical fruit with a glaucous-whitish surface. The other squashes may for practical purposes be divided into summer and winter kinds. Among the latter is the C. maxima, of which the fruit is spheroidal in form and often of great size, sometimes weighing 20 pounds. A variety of this is the crowned or turban squash, whose fruit has a circular projection at the top, the mark of the adherent calyx tube. Other winter squashes are of moderate size, and commonly either narrowed toward the base into a neck which in the "crook-necks" is curved to one side, or egg-shaped and pointed at the ends, as in the (Boston) marrow, long a standard in America, or the still better Hubbard squash. The winter squash can be preserved through the season. The summer squash has a very short vine, hence sometimes called bush-squash. Its fruit is smaller, and is either a crookneck or depressed in form, somewhat hemispherical with a scalloped border (see rimin); it is colored yellow, white, green, or green and white. Squashes are more grown in America than elsewhere, but also, especially the winter squashes, in continental Europe, and generally in temperate and tropical climates. In Great Britain the only ordinary squash is the vegetable marrow (see marrow), or succade gourd. The summer squash is eaten before maturity, prepared by boiling. The winter squash is boiled or roasted; in France and the East it is largely used in soups and ragouts, in America often made into pies. It is also used as food for animals.

Askutasquash, their Vine-apple, Which the English, from them call Squashes.

Roger Williams, Key to Lang. of America (ed. 1643), xvi.
 (Rhode Isl. Soc. Coll.).

 land, without a title. [U. S.]

The place where we made fast was a wooding station, owned by what is called a Squatter, a person who, without any title to the land, or leave asked or granted, squats himself down and declares himself the lord and master of the soil for the time being. B. Hall, Travels in N. A., II. 297.

Hence—3. One who or that which assumes domiciliary rights without a title.

The country people disliked the strangers, suspected the traders, detested the heretics, and abhorred the sacrile-gious squatters in the site of pristine piety and charity.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xvii.

4. One who obtains from the government a right of pasturage on moderate terms; also, any stock-owner. [Australia.]

Squatters, men who rent vast tracts of land from Government for the depasturing of their flocks, at an almost nominal sum, subject to a tax of so much a head on their sheep and cattle. H. Kingsley, Hillyars and Burtons, xlviii.

5. In ornith., same as krieker.—Squatter sover- eignty. See popular sovereignty, under popular.

At every thing of good esteem.

C. Smart, tr. of Phaedrus (1765), p. 145.

squeamish (skwē'mish), a. [Also dial. sweamish, swaimish; early mod. E. squeimish, squemish;

a later form (with suffix *-ish*¹ substituted for orig. -ous) of squeamons: see squeamons. The sense 'apt to be nauseated' may be due in part to association with qualmish.] 1. Easily disgusted or nauseated; hence, fastidious; scrupulous; particular; nice to excess in questions of propriety or taste; finical: as, a squeamish stomach; squeamish notions.

Let none other meaner person despise learning, nor . . . be any whit squeamish to let it be published under their names.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 17.

The modern civilized man is squeamish about pain to a degree which would have seemed effeminate or worse to his great-grandfather.

The Century, XXXVI. 633.

2. Qualmish; slightly nauseated; sickish: as, a squeamish feeling.

The wind grew high, and we, being among the sands, lay at anchor; I began to be dizzy and squeamish.

Pepys, Diary, I. 43.

= Syn. 1. Dainty, Fastidious, etc. (see nice), overnice, strait-laced.

To produce or procure by the application of pressure; express; extract; usually with out; as, to squeeze consent from an official. 5. To harass or oppress by exactions or the like. 6. To obtain a facsimile impression of on paper, by means of water and rubbing or beating. Squeeze, n. 1. The act of pressing; compression. 2. That which is forced out by or as by pressure; hence, oppressive exaction. 3. A cast or an impression, as of an inscription or a coin, produced by forcing some plastic material into the hollows or depressions of the surface; especially, such a facsimile or impression made by applying sheets of wet unsized paper to the edge of a type, and thoroughly passing over the sheets with light blows of a stiff brush, so as to force the paper into every interstices. 4. A paper, upon which, yielding a perfect and a negative or reversed copy, of the original. This device is employed by archaeologists for securing faithful copies of ancient inscriptions. 5. A kind of playing-cards in which the face-value of each card is shown in the upper left-hand corner, and can readily be seen by squeezing the cards slightly apart, without displaying the hand. — Alligator squeezer. Same as crocodile squeezer. — Crocodile squeezer, a peculiar form of squeezer, having a long projecting upper jaw armed with teeth. It is used in the manufacture of iron.

It is to him that we owe the copies and squeezes of the Nazareth inscriptions. Contemporary Rec., LIV, 302. And, therefore, with a stock of photographic plates, and with the more essential stock of paper for making moulds or squeezes from the stone, I began work on the temple of the Debs. Harper's Mag., LXXVII, 297.

squeezer (skwē'zēr), n. [< squeeze + -er] 1. One who or that which squeezes, specifically, an iron-working machine employed in getting the puddled ball into shape, or shingling it, without hammering. (See puddling.) Squeezers are of two kinds, reciprocating and rotary. The essential feature of the reciprocating form is that a movable arm or lever works against a corresponding fixed jaw, the former representing the

a, edge of centre shaft; b, edge of roller. The ball, faced with cast-iron, is pushed into shape by the arrow, and emerges at c.

hammer, the latter the anvil, of the old method of shingling with the hammer. In the rotary squeezer the puddled ball is brought into shape by being passed between a cast-iron cylinder and a cylindrical casing, the former being placed eccentrically within the latter so that the distance between their surfaces gradually diminishes in the direction of the rotation. The ball, being introduced at the widest part of the opening, is carried forward and finally delivered at the narrower end, reduced in size and ready for rolling. (b) In sheet-metal working, a crimping-machine for forcing the tops and covers of tin cans over the cylinders which form the sides of the cans. (c) A lemon-squeezer.

2. pl. A kind of playing-cards in which the face-value of each card is shown in the upper left-hand corner, and can readily be seen by squeezing the cards slightly apart, without displaying the hand. — Alligator squeezer. Same as crocodile squeezer. — Crocodile squeezer, a peculiar form of squeezer, having a long projecting upper jaw armed with teeth. It is used in the manufacture of iron.

squeezing (skwē'zīng), n. [Verbal n. of squeeze, v.] 1. The act of pressing; compression. — 2. That which is forced out by or as by pressure; hence, oppressive exaction.

The drugs and squeezings of the brain.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 607.

squeezing-box (skwē'zīng-boks), n. In ceram., a cylinder of metal, through an opening in the bottom of which plastic clay is forced in a continuous ribbon of any desired section, to form lugs, handles, etc.

squeezyt, a. See squeazy.
squelch (skwelch), v. [Formerly also squelch; prob. a var. with intensive prefix s-, of E. dial. quetch, a blow, bang.] A crushing blow; a heavy fall. [Colloq.]

But Ralpho, who had now begun
T' adventure resurrection
From heavy squelch, and had got up.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. ii. 933.

squelch (skwelch), v. [See squelch, n.] I. trans. 1. To crush down; stamp on as if squeezing out something liquid; put an end to. [Colloq.]

Stoot, this Fat Bishop hath so overlaid me,
So squelch'd and squeezed me.
Middleton, Game at Chess, v. 3.

Here, all about the fields, is the wild carrot. You cut off its head, just before it seeds, and you think you have squelch'd it; but this is just what Nature . . . wanted you to do.
J. Burroughs, The Century, XIX, 688.

2. To disconcert; discomfit; put down. [Colloq.]

Luke glanced shamefaced at the nosegay in his button-hole, and was squelched.
J. W. Palmer, After his Kind, p. 120.

II. intrans. To be crushed. [Colloq.]

squerelt, squerelt, squerill, n. Obsolete forms of squerel.

squeteague (skwetēg'), n. [*Also squette, squitter, squat; of Amer. Ind. origin.*] A salt-water sciaenoid fish, Cynoscion regalis (formerly Otolithus regalis), also called weakfish, sea-salmon, and sea-trout in common with some other members of the same genus. It is silvery, darker above, with many irregular, small, dark blotches tending to form oblique undulating bars. It is common from Cape Cod southward, and is a valued food-fish. A more distinctly marked fish of this kind is C. maculatus, the spotted squeteague, weakfish, or sea-trout, of more southerly distribution. See Cynoscion, and cut under weakfish.

squib (skwib), v.; pret. and pp. squibbed, ppr. squibbing. [*A var. of squip, < ME. squippa, a var. of scarp (ME. swappen), move swiftly, sweep, dash: see scarp, swipe.*] I. intrans. 1. To move swiftly and irregularly.

A battered unmarried bean, who squibs about from place to place.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lxxxviii.

2. [< squib, n., 3.] To make a slight, sharp report, like that of an exploding squib. — 3. [< squib, n., 4.] To resort to the use of squibs, or petty lampoons.

II. trans. 1. To throw (in or out) suddenly; explode.

Thou wast neerer squib out any new Salt-petre Iestes against honest Tucca.
Dekker, Humorous Poet (Works, ed. Pearson, I. 235).

He (Mr. Brian Twyne) squibs in this parenthesis.
Fuller, Hist. Cambridge University, i. § 52.

2. [< squib, n., 4.] To attack in squibs; lampoon.

squib (skwib), n. [< squib, v.] 1. A ball or tube filled with gunpowder, sent or fired swiftly through the air or along the ground, exploding somewhat like a rocket.

Like a Squib it falls,
Or fire-wing'd shaft, or sulph'ry Powder Balls.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Nor nimble squib is seen to make afeard
The gentleman.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, Prol.

So squibs and crackers fly into the air,
Then, only breaking with a noise, they vanish
In stench and smoke.
Ford, Broken Heart, ii. 2.

2. A reed, rush, quill, or roll of paper filled with a priming of gunpowder; a tube of some kind used to set off a charge of gunpowder, as at the bottom of a drill-hole. Also called mote, train, and match. — 3. A fire-cracker, especially one broken in the middle so that when it is fired the charge explodes without a loud report. — 4. A petty lampoon; a short satirical writing or sketch holding up a person or thing to ridicule.

Allowing that . . . [the play] succeeds, there are a hundred squibs flying all abroad to prove that it should not have succeeded.
Goldsmith, Polite Learning, x.

5*t.* One who writes lampoons or squibs; a petty satirist; a paltry, trifling fellow.

The squibs are those who, in the common phrase of the word, are called libellers, lampooners, and pamphleteers.
Steele, Tatler, No. 88.

6. A kind of cheap taffy, made of treacle.

And there we had a shop, too, for lollipops and squibs.
Hood, Lines by a Schoolboy.

squibbish (skwib'ish), a. [< squib + -ish]. Flashy; light. T. Mace, Music's Monument. (Derives.) squid (skwid), n. [Origin unknown.] 1. A kind of cuttlefish or calamary; a dibranchiate cephalopod with ten arms, especially of the family Loliginidae or Tenuthididae. The name is most frequently given to the small, slender calamaries, a few inches long and with a caudal fin, which are much used as bait, but is extended (with or without a qualifying term) to many other species of different genera and families, some of which, as the giant squids, are the largest of cephalopods. See cuts under Architeuthis, calamary, Desmoteuthis, Loliginidae, Sepiola, and Spirula, and compare those under Dibranchiata, cuttlefish, and sepi.

2. An artificial bait or lure of metal, ivory, etc., used in angling or trolling for fish, often simply a fish-hook on the shank of which a mass of lead is melted in cylindrical or tapering form to imitate a squid (def. 1). False squids, the Loligopsida. — Flying squids, the Ommastrephidae. — Giant squids, the very large cephalopods of the genus Architeuthis, as A. harveyi of the Atlantic coast of North America, among those called devil-fish. See cut under Architeuthis. — Long-armed squids, the Chroteuthididae. — Long-finned squids, species of Loliginidae. See cut under Loliginidae. — Short-finned squids, species of Ommastrephidae, as O. leucorhynchus common in New England seas and northward, and a principal source of bait.

squeeze (skwēz), n. [< squeeze, v.] 1. Pressure, or an application of pressure; a hug or embrace; a friendly, sympathetic, or loving grasp; as, a squeeze of the hand.

Had a very affectionate squeeze by the hand, and a fine compliment in a corner.
Gray, Letters, I. 239.

2. To pass (through a body) under the application of pressure.

A concave sphere of gold filled with water, and soldered up, has, upon pressing the sphere with great force, let the water squeeze through it and stand all over its outside in multitudes of small drops like dew, without bursting or cracking the body of the gold.

Newton, Opticks, ii. 3, prop. 8.

3. To press, push, or force one's way through or into some tight, narrow, or crowded place; pass by pressing or pushing.

Many a public minister comes empty in; but, when he has crammed his guts, he is fain to squeeze hard before he can get off.
Sir R. L. Estlin.

4. To pass (through a body) under the application of pressure.

2. To pass (through a body) under the application of pressure.

squilter, n. A Middle English form of sculler².

squillgee (skwil'jē), n. [Also squillagee, squillgee, also squiggee, squigee (see squiggee); origin obscure; perhaps connected with swill, swish, wash, rinse; but the term is not explained.]

1. Naut.: (a) An implement somewhat resembling a wooden hoe, with an edge of india-rubber or thick leather, used to scrape the water from wet decks. (b) A small swab. (c) A becket and toggle used to confine a studding-sail while setting it.—2. One of several implements constructed like the nautical implement above defined (1 (a)), used for washing glass, in photographic work, etc. See squeeggee, 2.

squillgee (skwil'jē), v. t. [squillgee, n.] Naut., to scrape (the wet decks of a ship) with a squillgee.

The washing, swabbing, squillgeeing, etc., lasts, or is made to last, until eight o'clock, when breakfast is ordered, fore and aft. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 100.

squillgee-toggle (skwil'jē-tog'l), n. A toggle with a small line fastened to it, used to secure a strap round a studdingsail while being set, so that by pulling out the squillgee when the sail is hoisted far enough the sail is released.

squill¹ (skwil), n. [ME. squilla, squyll, squille, squyle, < OF. squille, scille, F. squille, scille = Sp. esquila = Pg. scilla = It. squilla, < L. squilla, scilla, squill = Gr. σκίλλα, squill, perhaps for σκίλλα* (as equiv. σχινος for σχιδρος*), and so called from its splitting easily into scales, < σχίζω, split; see schism.] 1. The medicinal bulb of Urginea Scilla, or the plant itself; the officinal squill. See Urginea.—2. Any plant of the genus Scilla (which see). S. nutans is commonly called bluebell, or wild hyacinth. The spring squill, S. verna, and the autumn squill, S. autumnalis, are small European wild flowers of no great merit in cultivation. The star-flowered squill, S. amara, is a distinct early species, the flowers indigo-blue with large yellowish-green ovary, less attractive than the species following. The early squill, S. bifolia, produces rich masses of dark-blue flowers very early in the spring. The Spanish squill, S. Hispanica (S. campanulata), is a fine species of early summer, with a strong pyramidal raceme of large pendulous usually light blue flowers; also called Spanish bluebell. The Italian squill, S. Italica, has pale blue flowers with intensely blue stamens. The pyramidal or Peruvian squill, S. Peruviana, not from Peru, but from the Mediterranean region, has pale blue flowers with white stamens, the flowers very numerous in a regular pyramid. The Siberian squill, S. Sibirica (S. amurensis), not from Siberia, but from southern Russia, is a very choice small early-flowering species, the blossom of a peculiar porcelain-blue. These are all hardy except the pyramidal squill.—Chinese squill, a species of Scilla, S. Chinesis, once classed as Barnardea. Compound syrup of squill. See syrup.

—Oxymel of squill. See oxymel.—Pancratic squill, a variety of the officinal squill said to be milder in its action.—Roman squill, the Roman hyacinth, Hyacinthus Romanus, once classed as Scilla, also as Bithyca. Wild squill, the American wild hyacinth, or eastern camass, Camassia (Scilla) Fraseri.

Squill Urginea Scilla.

squill² (skwil), n. [< L. squilla, scilla, a small fish of the lobster kind, a prawn, shrimp, so called from a supposed resemblance to the bulb or plant of the same name; see squill¹.]

1. A stomatopodous crustacean of the genus Squilla or family Squillidae; a mantis shrimp or squill-fish. See cuts under mantis shrimp and Squillidae.—2. An insect so called from its resemblance to the preceding; a mantis. Also called squill-insect.

Squilla (skwil'jē), n. [NL. (Fabricius), < L. squilla, scilla, a prawn; see squill².] 1. The representative genus of Squillidae, containing such crustaceans as S. mantis, the common mantis-shrimp or locust-shrimp. The southern squill of the United States is Coronis glabriuscula. See cuts under mantis shrimp and Squillidae.—2. [l. c.] Same as squill², 1.—3. [l. c.] Same as squill², 2.

The Squilla, an insect, differs but little from the fish Squilla. Mouffet, Theater of Insects, II. xxvii.

squillagee (skwil'a-jē), n. Same as squillgee.

squillante (skwil-lan'te), a. [It., ppr. of squillare, clang, ring. In music, ringing; bell-like in tone.

squill-fish (skwil'fish), n. A squill, or some similar crustacean.

squillian (skwil'an), a. [= F. squillon; as L. squilla, squill (see squill²), + -an.] Of or pertaining to a squill; belonging or relating to the Squillidae.

Squillidae (skwil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Squilla + -idae.] A family of stomatopod crustaceans, typified by the genus Squilla, to which the Stomatopoda are sometimes restricted; the mantis-shrimps or gastrurans. The pseudogenus Alima and at least two other spurious genera were named from larval forms of this family. Other good genera than the type are Coronis and Gonodactylus. Also called Squillacea.

squill-insect[†] (skwil'in'sekt), n. Same as squill², 2. N. Grev.

squillitic (skwil-it'ik), a. [< L. squilliticus, scillicus, < Gr. σκιλατικός, pertaining to the squill; see squill².] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from squill.

A decoction of this kind of worms sodden in squillitic vinegar. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxx. 3.

squimble-squamblet, adv. Same as skimble-squamble. Colley.

squint[†] (skwin), v. i. and t. [Also squean, skeen, sken, also squiny, formerly squiny; cf. squint.] To squint.

As doctors in their deepest doubts Stroke up their foreheads hie;
Or men amaze their sorrow founts
By squeaning with the eye.
Armin's Italian Taylor and his Boy (1600). (Nares) squinance[†] (skwin'ans), n. Same as squincancy, 1.

squincancy[†] (skwin'an-si), n. [Also contr. squincy, quinsy; < ME. squinacie, squinacie, < OF. esquinacie, squinacie, quinsy; see quinsy.] 1. Quinsy.

Diseases that be verie perillous: . . . to wit, the Pleuresie, Squinacie, inflammation, sharpe Feuer, or Apoplexie. Gauvart, Letters (tr. by Helwiese, 1577), p. 288.

2. The quinsy-wort.

squincancy-berry[†] (skwin'an-si-ber'i), n. Same as quinsy-berry.

squincancy-wort[†] (skwin'an-si-wert), n. Same as quinsy-wort.

squincet, n. [Early mod. E. squynce; var. of squincy, etc.] Same as squincancy.

Diseases and sicknesses, as squincies. Str T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 22.

squinch¹ (skwinch), n. [A var. of sconce².] In arch., a small arch, or a series of arches, corbeled out, thrown across an angle, as in a square tower to support the side of a superimposed octagon. In Western architecture it is frequent as performing the function of the Eastern pendentive. The application of the term may be due to the resemblance of this structure to a corner cupboard, which was also called quinch or sconce. See cut in next column.

squinch² (skwinch), n. A dialectal variant of quince.

Squill.

squincy[†], n. [A contraction of squincancy; see squincancy, quinsy.] Quinsy.

squink (skwink), v. i. [A dial. form of wink; see squint and wink.] To wink. [Prov. Eng.]

squinky (skwin'i), v. i. [Formerly also squiny; see squint.] To squint. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

I remember thine eyes well enough. Dost thou squiny at me?
Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 140.

squint (skwint), a. and n. [Not found in ME., except as in asquint, askew; appar. an extension of the obs. or dial. squin, squian, sken, prob. connected with D. schuinen, slant, slope, schuin, slant, sloping; perhaps associated with E. dial. squink, wink, partly a var. of wink, partly < Sw. svinka, shrink, flinch, nasalized form of svika, balk, flinch, fail; cf. Dan. svigte, bend, fail, forsake; AS. swican, escape, avoid. The history of the word is meager, and the forms appar. related are more or less involved.]

1. Looking different ways; characterized by non-coincidence of the optic axes; affected with strabismus; said of eyes.

Some things that are not heard
He mutters to himself, and his squint eye Casts towards the Moone, as should his wits there lye.
Herrick, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 190).

2. That looks or is directed obliquely; looking askance; indirect; oblique; sinister.

The pleasure I shall live in, and the freedom,
Without the squint eye of the law upon me,
Or prating liberty of tongues that envy!
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iii. 1.

I incline to hope, rather than fear,
And gladly banish squint suspicion.
Milton, Comus, l. 413.

Squint quoin, in arch., an external oblique angle.

II. 1. An affection of the eyes, consisting in non-coincidence of the optic axes; a squint eye; strabismus (which see).

He's blue eyes, and not to be called a squint, though a little cast he's certainly got. Hood, The Lost Heir.

2. An oblique or furtive look; a furtive glance; hence (colloquially), a leaning, an inclination: as, he had a decided squint toward democracy.—3. In arch., an oblique opening through the walls of some old churches, usually having for its object to enable a person in the transepts or aisles to see the elevation of the host at the high altar. The usual situation for a squint is on one or both sides of the chancel arch; but they are also found in other positions, though always directed toward an altar. Generally they are not above a yard high, and 2 feet wide, but sometimes they form narrow arches 10 or 12 feet in height, as at Minster-Lovel, Oxfordshire. The name hagioscope is sometimes applied to them.—Braid's squint, the turning of the eyes simultaneously upward and inward, as if trying to look at the middle of one's own forehead, as a means of producing a hypnotic state.

squint (skwint), v. [< squint, n.] I. intrans. 1. To look askew, or with the eyes differently directed; look askance.

He gets a crick in his neck oft-times with squinting up at windowes and Belconies.
Brome, Sparagus Garden, iii. 4.

Some can squint when they will. Bacon.

2. To be affected with strabismus.—3. To run or be directed obliquely; have an indirect reference or bearing.

Not a period of this epistle but squints towards another over against it. Pope.

squirelet, n. An obsolete form of squirrel. squirelet (skwir'let), n. [< squirel + -let.] A petty squire; a squireling. Carlyle, Misc., iii.
 56. (Davies.)

squireling (skwir'ling), n. [< squirel + -lingl.] A petty squire; a squirelet.

But to-morrow, if we live,
 Our ponderous squire will give A grand political dinner
 To half the squirelings near.

Tennyson, Maud, xx. 2. squirely (skwir'li), a. [< squirel + -lyl.] Befitting or characteristic of a squire.

One very fit for this squirely function.
 Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, i. 4. (Latham.)

How could that oligarchy (the Southern States of the United States), with its squirely tastes, its free wasteful outdoor life, its love of landed property, and its contempt for manual labour, become a trading community?

The Academy, July 20, 1889, p. 32.

squireship (skwir'ship), n. [< squirel + -ship.] Same as squirehood. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, i. 4. (Latham.)

squiress (skwir'es), n. [< squirel + -ess.] The wife of a squire. Bulwer, Pelham, vii. (Davies.)
 [Colloq., Eng.]

squirm (skwirm), v. i. [Prob. a var. of squir, throw with a jerk, influenced by association with swarm and worm: see squir.] 1. To wrig-gle or writhe, as an eel or a worm; hence, to writhe mentally.

You never need think you can turn over any old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horned little population that dwells under it.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, v.

They [worms in the pupa state] only squirm a little in a feeble way now and then, and grow stiffer, till they can't squirm at all, and then they're mummies, and that's the end of it till the butterflies are born.

Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, viii.

2. To climb by wriggling; "shin": as, to squirm up a tree.

squirm (skwirm), n. [< squirm, v.] 1. A wriggling motion, like that of a worm or an eel.—
 2. Aunt., a twist in a rope.

squirm, v. See squirm.

squirrel (skwir'el or skwir'el), n. [Early mod.
 E. also squirrel, squerrel, squrel, squiril; < ME.

sciurellus (also, after Rom., sciuriolus, sciurellus, sciurellus, corruptly sciopellus, sciopellus, sciopellus, sciopellus, etc.), dim. of L. sciurus; < Gr.
σκιῦρα, a squirrel, lit. "shadow-tailed," < σκια, shadow, + οπίσθια, tail. For the sense, cf. E. dial. skag, a squirrel, lit. "shade": see skag.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the family Sciuridae and genus Sciurus, originally and specifically Sci-rus vulgaris of Europe. Squirrels have pointed ears and a long bushy tail; they are of active arboreal habits, and are able to sit up on their hind quarters and use the fore paws like hands. S. vulgaris, called in England skug, is a squirrel 8 or 10 inches long (the tail being nearly as much more), with an elegant reddish-brown coat, white below, and the ears tufted or pencilled. It lives in trees, is very agile and graceful in its movements, feeds on all kinds of small hard fruits, nests in a hole, hibernates to some extent in the colder latitudes, and brings forth usually three or four young. It is readily tamed, and makes an interesting pet. The North American squirrel nearest to this one is the chickaree, or red squirrel, S. hudsonius.

 (See cut under chickaree.) The common gray squirrel of the United States is S. carolinensis. (See cut under Sci-rus.) Fox- or cat-squirrels are several large red, gray, or black species of North America. (See cut under fox-squirrel.) North America (including Mexico and Central America) is very rich in squirrels; southern Asia and Africa are less rich, while South America and Europe have each but a single species of Sciurus proper. In the extension of the name squirrel to other genera of the family, the species of Tamias, Spermophilus, and Cynomys are distinguished as ground-squirrels or prairie-squirrels, and some of them are also called marmot-squirrels (see cuts under chipmunk, Spermophilus, owl, and prairie-dog);
 those of Sciuropterus and Pteromys are flying-squirrels (see cuts under flying-squirrel and Sciuropterus). The scale-tailed squirrels of Africa belong to a different family, Ammodontidae. (See cut under Ammodontidae.) Certain Australian marsupials, as phalangers or petaurists, which resemble squirrels, are improperly so called. (See cut under Aerobates.) Some Sciuridae have other vernacular names, as skug, assapan, taguan, jelernan, hecker, chick-aree, gopher, siskit, suskit, prairie-dog, wisdomish, etc.; but squirrel, without a qualifying term, is practically confined to the genus Sciurus, all the many members of which resemble one another too closely to be mistaken. See the technical names, and cut under Xerus.

2. In cotton-manuf., one of the small card-covered rollers used with the large roller of a carding-machine. Also called urchin.—Barking squirrel, the prairie-dog; an early name of this animal as brought to notice by Lewis and Clarke in 1814.—

Burrowing squirrel, Lewis and Clarke's name (1814) of a prairie-dog, or some related prairie-squirrel.—Chipping-squirrel, the chipmunk.—Federation squirrel, the thirteen-lined spermophile, or striped gopher; so called in allusion to the thirteen stripes of the flag of the original States of the American Union. S. L. Mitchell, 1821. See cut under Spermophilus. Hunt the squirrel. See hunt. (See also flying-squirrel, prairie-squirrel, sugar-squirrel.)

squirrel-bot (skwir'el-bot), n. A bot-fly, Cutiterbra emasculator, whose larvæ infest the genital and axillary regions of various squirrels and gophers in the United States, particularly the serotum and testicles of the male of Tamias striatus, the striped chipmunk.

squirrel-corn (skwir'el-körn), n. A pretty spring wild flower, Dielytra (Dicentra) Canadensis, of eastern North America. It has elegant dissected leaves, graceful racemes of a few cream-colored heart-shaped blossoms, and separate yellow tubers which resemble kernels of Indian corn. See Dicentra. Less commonly called turkey-corn.

squirrel-cup (skwir'el-kup), n. The hepatica or liverleaf.

squirrel-fish (skwir'el-fish), n. 1. Any fish of the family Holocentridæ, and especially of the genus Holocentrus. The numerous species are remarkable for the development of sharp spines almost everywhere on the surface of the body. The name refers to the noise they make when taken out of the water, which suggests the bark of a squirrel. H. pentacanthus of the West Indies, occasional on the United States coast, is chiefly of a bright-red color, with streaks shining lengthwise; its bright tints and quick movements make it one of the most conspicuous denizens of rocky tide-pools.
 See cut under Holocentridæ.

2. The serrano, Diplectrum fasciculare, distinguished by the segregation of the serrae at the angle of the preoperculum into two groups. It is common in the West Indies, and also along the southern United States coast to North Carolina.—3. A local name of the pinfish, Lagodon rhomboides.

squirrel-grass (skwur'el-grās), n. Same as squirreltail.

squirrel-hake (skwur'el-hāk), n. A gadoid fish, Phycis chuss; the white hake. See chuss, *hake*², 2, and cut under Phycis.

squirrel-hawk (skwur'el-hāk), n. The ferruginous rough-legged hawk, Archibuteo ferrugineus, the largest and handsomest bird of its genus, found in California and most other parts of western North America from British America southward: so called because it preys extensively upon ground-squirrels and related rodents. It is 23 inches long and 55 in extent; when adult the under parts are nearly white, with rich chestnut flags barred with black; the tail is mostly white, clouded with silver-gray, and tinged with bay; and the dark upper parts are much varied with brownish red.

squirrel-lemur (skwur'el-lē'mér), n. A lemur of the subfamily Galagininae, and especially of the genus Galago. See cut under Galago.

squirrel-lock (skwur'el-lok), n. Squirrel-fur from the under sides of the body. In gray squirrels it is pale-yellow, and it is used for lining winter garments.

squirrel-monkey

(skwur'el-mung-ki), n. One of many kinds of small South American monkeys with a long, bushy, and non-prehensile tail: so called from their general aspect. (a) Any member of the family Hapalidae or Midiæ; a marmoset. See cut under Hapale. (b) Especially, a saimiri or titi of the genus Chrysotrrix, as the death's-head, C. scitourus. See saimiri, and compare saguin.

Squirrel monkey, Chrysotrrix aureus.

squirrel-mouse (skwur'el-mous), n. Same as dormouse.

squirrel-petaurist (skwur'el-pe-tā'rist), n. A squirrel-phalanger.

squirrel-phalanger (skwur'el-fā-lan'jēr), n. An Australian flying-phalanger, or petaurist, as Petaurus (Belideus) sciureus, a marsupial mammal resembling a squirrel in some respects.

squirrel-shrew (skwur'el-shrō), n. A small insectivorous mammal of the family Tupauidæ, as a banxring or a pentail. See cuts under Tupaia and Ptilocercus.

squirreltail (skwur'el-tāl), n. One of several grasses of the genus Hordeum. (a) In Great Britain, H. maritimum, and sometimes H. murinum, the wall-barley, and H. secalinum (H. pratense), the meadow-barley. (b) In the United States, chiefly H. jubatum, but in California also H. murinum, there naturalized and, as elsewhere, a pest, infesting wool, also the throats, etc., of animals, with its long barbed awns.

squirt (skwért), v. [E. dial. also swirt; perhaps < LG. swirtjen, squirt. The equiv. verb squitter can hardly be connected.] I. trans. 1. To eject with suddenness and force in a jet or rapid stream from a narrow orifice: as, to squirt water in one's face.

The hard-featured miscreant . . . coolly rolled his tobacco in his cheek and squirted the juice into the fire-grate. Scott, Guy Mannering, xxxiii.

2. To spatter or bespatter.

To spurn or baffle them, or squirt their eyes with ink. R. Jansen, Apol. to Postaster.

II. intrans. 1. To issue suddenly in a thin jet or jet-like stream, as from a syringe, or a narrow orifice suddenly opened; spurt.

The oars seemed to lash the water savagely, like a connected row of swords, and the spray squirted at each vicious stroke. C. Reade, Hard Cash, i.

2†. To prate; blab. [Old slang.]—Squirting cucumber. See Ecballium.

squirt (skwért), n. [< squirt, v.] 1. An instrument with which a liquid may be ejected in a strong jet-like stream; a syringe.

His weapons are a pin to scratch and a squirt to bespatter. Pope.

2. A small jet: as, a squirt of water.—3. A system of motion of a fluid, where the motion is everywhere irrotational, and where there is no expansion except at isolated points.—4. Looseness of the bowels; diarrhea. [Low.]—5. A small, insignificant, but self-assertive fellow; an upstart; a cad. [Colloq.]—6. A hasty start or spurt. [Colloq.]

How different from the rash jerks and bare-brain'd squirts thou art wont, Tristram, to transact it with in other humours—dropping thy pen, spurring thy ink about thy table and thy books. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 28.

7. A sea-squirt; an ascidian or tunicary. squirtier (skwér'tér), n. [< squirt + -er¹.] One who or that which squirts. O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-Table, v.

Stabat Mater (stā'bat mā'tér). [So called from the first words of the Latin text, Stabat mater, 'The mother (sc. of Jesus) was standing': L. stabat, 3d pers. sing. imperf. ind. of stare, stand (see stand); mater = Gr. μήτηρ = E. mother: see mother.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy, a sequence on the Virgin Mary at the crucifixion, written about 1300 by Jacobus de Benedictis (Jacopone da Todi). It has also been ascribed to Innocent III. and others, and was probably modeled on older hymns such as the stauothotokia of the Greek Church. It is sung after the Epistle on the Feasts of the Seven Dolours of the Blessed Virgin Mary on the Friday before Good Friday and on the third Sunday in September. 2. A musical setting of this sequence. Famous examples have been written by Palestrina, Pergolesi, Rossini, Dvořák, and others.

stable-boy (stă'bl-boi), n. A boy who is employed about a stable.

stable-call (stă'bl-kâl), n. A trumpet-signal in the cavalry and light artillery services, to assemble the troop or battery for the purpose of watering and grooming the horses; hence, the assembling of a troop for this purpose.

Will you go down to stable-call and pick out a mount? The Century, XXXVII. 900.

stable-fly (stă'bl-flî), n. 1. The biting house-fly, Stomoxys calcitrans, common to Europe and North America. It much resembles the common house-fly, Musca domestica, but bites severely and is often very troublesome. As it enters houses before storms, it has given rise to the expression "flies bite before a storm."

2. Another fly, Cyrtoneura stabulans, common to Europe and North America.

stably, adv. A Middle English form of stably.

stable-man (stă'bl-mân), n. A man who attends in a stable; an ostler; a groom.

stability (stă'bl-nes), n. [< ME. stabilnesse, stabulnes, stabulness; < stable² + -ness.] The state, character, or property of being stable, in any sense of the word.

stabler (stă'bl-er), n. [< ME. stabler, stabyller, *< OF. stabler = Sp. establero, a stable-boy, < L. stabularius, a stable-boy, also a host, a taverner, landlord, prop. adj., pertaining to a stable or to a public house, < stabulum, a stable, a public house; see stable¹.] A person who stables horses, or furnishes accommodations and food for them.*

There came a man to the stabler (so they call the people at Edinburgh that take in horses to keep), and wanted to know if he could hear of any returned horses for England. Defoe, Col. Jack, p. 240. (Darvies).

stable-stand (stă'bl-stand), n. In old Eng. law, the position of a man who is found at his place in the forest with a crossbow bent, or with a long-bow, ready to let fly at a deer, or standing near a tree with greyhounds in a leash ready to slip. This is one of the four presumptions that a man intends stealing the king's deer.

stableter, n. A Middle English form of stability.

stabling (stă'bling), n. [Verbal n. of stable¹, v.] 1. The act of putting horses or other beasts into a stable.—2. Stable accommodation; shelter for horses and other beasts; stables.

Her terror once on Afric's lawny shore, Now smok'd in dust, a stabling now for wolves. Thomson, Liberty, iii. 372.

The villas look dreary and lonesome, . . . with their high garden walls, their long, low piles of stabling, and the passé indécence of their nymphs and fauns. Hovells, Venetian Life, xxi.

stablish (stă'lish), v. t. [*< ME. stabilichen, stabilissen, stabilissen, < OF. etablisse, stem of certain parts of establir, F. établir, < L. stabilire, make firm or steadfast; see stable², v. Cf. establish.] To make stable or firm; establish; set up; ordain. [Archaic.]*

Devyn the wht . . . *stablish*synth many manere gyses to thinges that ben to done. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 6.

To stop effusion of our Christian blood, And stablish quietness on every side. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 1. 10.

Let a man stablish himself in those courses he approves. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 238.

stablishment (stă'lish-ment), n. [< stablish + -ment. Cf. establishment.] Establishment. For stint of strife and stablishment of rest. Spenser, F. Q., V. viii. 21.

stably (stă'bli), adv. [< ME. stably, stably; < stable² + -ly.] In a stable manner; firmly; fixedly; securely. God disposith in his puryaunce syngulerly and stably the thinges that ben to done. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 6.

Thay saide a sterne, with lemys bright, Owte of the Eest shulde stably stande. York Plays, p. 126.

stabulation (stab-ŭ-lā'shōn), n. [*< L. stabulatio(-n-), a place where cattle are housed, < stabulari, pp. stabulatus, stable, lodge; see stable¹, v.] 1. The act of stabling beasts.—2. A place or room for stabling beasts.*

stabwort (stab'wört), n. The wood-sorrel, Oxalis Acetosella: so called as being considered good for wounds.

stabyller. A Middle English form of stable¹, stable².

stacca (stă'kă), n. A Welsh dry measure, equal to three Winchester bushels.

staccatissimo (stăk-kă-tis'i-mō), a. [*It., superl. of staccato, detached; see staccato.*] In music, very staccato.

staccato (stăk-kă'tō), a. [*< It. staccato, pp. of staccare, for distaccare, separate, detach; see detach.*] In music, detached; disconnected; abrupt; separated from one another by slight pauses; used both of single tones in a melody and of chords; opposed to legato. Three grades of staccato are sometimes recognized—the slightest being marked by dots over or under the notes with a sweeping curve (a), the next by dots without the curve (b), and the greatest by pointed strokes instead of dots (c). In each case something is subtracted from the duration of each note, and given to a rest or silence. On keyboard-instruments like the pianoforte and organ, a staccato effect is produced by a variation of the usual touch in the action either of the fingers, of the wrist, or of the forearm; in bow-instruments like the violin, by an abrupt detached motion of the bow, or by a springing bow; in wind-instruments, by stopping the mouthpiece with the tongue (sometimes called tuquing); and in the voice, either by a detached action of the breath or by a closing of the glottis. The word is also used sometimes to note an abrupt emphatic style of speaking or writing. Staccato mark, in musical notation, a dot or pointed stroke added over or under a note to indicate a staccato rendering.—Staccato touch, in playing the pianoforte or organ, a touch designed to produce a clear and musical staccato effect.

stacher (stăch'ér), v. i. A Scotch form of stacker.

Stachydeæ (stă-kid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham, 1836), < Stachys (assumed stem Stachyd-) + -æ.] A tribe of gamopetalous plants, of the order Labiatae. It is characterized by a five- or ten-nerved or -veined calyx, a corolla with the upper lip erect, concave, and commonly galeate or arched, the lower lip three-cleft and spreading, four perfect ascending or included stamens, with the forward pair longer, and a four-parted ovary forming in fruit four dry nutlets fixed by a small basal or slightly oblique scar. It includes 36 genera (of which Stachys is the type), classed in the subtribes Scutellariææ, Melittææ, Marrubiacæ, and Lamiææ; other important genera are Physostemion, Branelle (Prunella), Phlomis, Sideritis, Biditola, Gubopis, Lamium, Leonurus, and Molucella. See cut under Self-heal.

Stachys (stă'kis), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. stachys, < Gr. σταχυς, a plant, woundwort, Stachys arvensis, so called from the spiked flowers; a particular use of σταχυς, an ear of corn, a spike, in gen. a plant.] A genus of plants, of the order Labiales, type of the tribe Stachydeæ. It is characterized by flowers with the five calyx-teeth equal or the posterior larger, the corolla-tube somewhat cylindrical and either included in or exerted from the calyx, the upper lip usually entire and arched, the anther-cells usually diverging, and the ovary forming nutlets which are obtuse or rounded at the top. Over 200 species have been described, of which about 170 are now thought to be distinct. They are widely dispersed through the temperate zones, occur within the tropics on mountains, and extend in a few cases into frigid and subalpine regions. They are lacking in Australia and New Zealand, and nearly so in Chili and in South Africa. Sixteen species occur in the United States; 5 are eastern, of which S. aspera is the most common, and S. palustris the most widely diffused. Several species, especially S. sylvatica of Europe, are known as hedge-nettle, and several others as woundwort, particularly S. Germanica. For S. betonica see betony, and for S. palustris see down-heal. Several species are occasionally cultivated for ornament, as S. lanata, a woolly-leaved plant much used for edgings. S. aphidis (S. tuberosa), an esculent recently introduced from Japan, cultivated in France under the name of crosmes, produces numerous small white tubers which may be eaten boiled or fried or prepared as a preserve. The tubers are said to decay rapidly if exposed to the air, and are kept in the ground or packed in sand; their taste is compared to that of the sweet potato, followed by a peculiar piquant flavor.

Stachytarpheta (stăk'i-tăr-fô'tä), n. [NL. (Vahl, 1804), so called from the thick flower-spikes; prob. an error for Stachytarpheta, < Gr. στάχυς, a spike, + ταρφή, thick, dense, < τροφή, thicken.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Verbenaceæ and tribe Verbeneæ. It is characterized by sessile spiked flowers with a narrow five-ribbed five-nerved calyx, a corolla with five spreading lobes, two perfect stamens with divaricate anther-cells, and a two-celled ovary ripening into two hard dry oblong or linear one-seeded nutlets. There are about 45 species, natives of tropical and subtropical America, with one species, S. Indica, also dispersed through tropical Africa and Asia. They are herbs or shrubs bearing opposite or alternate toothed and commonly rugose leaves. The flowers are white, blue, purple, or scarlet, solitary in the axils of bracts, and sessile or half-immersed in the axis of the more or less densely crowded terminal spikes. The species are sometimes called bastard or false vervain. S. Jamaicensis (now identified with S. Indica) is the vervain (which see), from its use sometimes called Brazilian tea. This and other species, as S. mutabilis, a handsome ever-blooming shrub, are occasionally cultivated under glass.

stack¹ (stak), n. [ME. stack, stacke, stakke, stak, stac, < Icel. stakkr, a stack of hay (cf. stakka, a stump). = Sw. stack = Dan. stak, a stack, pile of hay; allied to stack², and ult. from the root of stick¹. Hence staggard².] 1. A pile of grain in the sheaf, or of hay, straw, pease, etc., gathered into a circular or rectangular form, often, when of large size, coming to a point or ridge at the top, and thatched to protect it from the weather.

The whole prairie was covered with yellow wheat stacks.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII, 331.

2. A pile of sticks, billets, poles, or cordwood; formerly, also, a pyre, or burial pile.

Against every pillar was a stack of billets above a man's height, which the watermen that bring wood down the Seine . . . laid there.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 249.

3. A pile or group of other objects in orderly position. (a) In printing, a flat pile of paper, printed or unprinted, in a press-room or bindery. (b) Milit., the pyramidal group formed by a number of muskets with fixed bayonets when stacked. (c) In paper-making, four or more calendering-rolls in position. (d) In libraries, a set of book-shelves one above the other, whether placed against a wall or standing in the middle of a room.

4. A number of funnels or chimneys standing together.—5. A single chimney or passage-way for smoke; the chimney or funnel of a locomotive or steam-vessel: also called smoke-stack. See cuts under passenger-engine and puddling-furnace.—6. A high detached rock; a columnar rock; a precipitous rock rising out of the sea. The use of the word stack with this meaning is very common on the coast of Scotland and the adjacent islands (especially the Orkneys), and is almost exclusively limited to that region.

Here [in Shetland] also, near 200 yards from the shore, stands the Stack of Snalda, a grand perpendicular column of rock, at least sixty, but more probably eighty, feet high, on the summit of which the eagle has annually nested from time immemorial.
Shirreff, Shetland, p. 5.

7. A customary unit of volume for fire-wood and coal, generally 4 cubic yards (108 cubic feet). The three-quarter stack in parts of Derbyshire is said to be 105 or 106 cubic feet.—8. pl. A large quantity; "lots": as, stacks of money. [Slang.] = Syn. 1. Shock, etc. See sheaf¹.

stack¹ (stak), v. t. [ME. stakken (= Sw. stacka = Dan. stakke), stack; from the noun.] 1. To pile or build in the form of a stack; make into a regularly formed pile: as, to stack grain.

Your hay is well brought in, and better stacked than usual.
Swift, to Dr. Sheridan, Sept. 19, 1725.

2. To make up (cards) in a designed manner, so as to secure an unfair advantage; pack.—To stack arms, to stand together muskets or rifles with fixed bayonets in definite numbers, as four or six together, so that they form a tent-shaped group.

stack² (stak). An obsolete or dialectal pret-erit of stick¹ (and stick²).

stackage (stăk'aj), n. [< stack¹ + -age.] 1. Grain, hay, etc., put up in stacks. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.—2. A tax on things stacked. Imp. Dict.

stack-borer (stăk'bôr'ér), n. An instrument for piercing stacks of hay, to admit air, where the hay is in danger of damage from heating.

stacken-cloud[†] (stăk'n-klood), n. A cumulus cloud.

The rapid formation and disappearance of small cumuli is a process constantly going on in particular kinds of weather. These little stacken-clouds seem to form out of the atmosphere, and to be resolved again as rapidly into it.
Forster, Atmospheric Phenomena, p. 58.

stacker¹ (stăk'ér), v. i. [Se. also stakker, stacker; < ME. stakeren, also stakelen, < Icel. stakra, push, stagger, freq. of staka, push, punt; cf. stjaka, punt, push with a stake (stjaki, a punt-pole), = Dan. stuge = Sw. staka, push, punt with a stake, = MD. staken, stacken, set stakes, dam up with stakes, give up work, = E. stake¹: see stake¹, v. Doublet of stagger.] 1. To stagger. [Prov. Eng.]

She rist her up, and stakereth heer and ther.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2657.

2. To stammer. Prompt. Parv., p. 471.

stacker² (stăk'ér), n. [< stack¹ + -er¹.] An attachment to a threshing-machine for raising and delivering the straw from the machine, either upon a wagon or upon a stack. It consists of an endless-belt elevator running in a trough that can be placed at any angle, the whole being mounted on wheels, and connected by belting with the thrasher, or with the engine or other motor. Also called straw- or hay-elevator, and stacking-machine. Another form of stacker consists of a portable derrick used with a hay-fork, and commonly called a stacking-derrick.

stacket (stăk'et), n. [< G. stacket, a palisade, stockade; appar. connected with stack¹.] A stockade. Scott.

stack-funnel (stăk'fun'el), n. A pyramidal open frame of wood in the center of a stack. Its object is to allow the air to circulate through the stack, and prevent the heating of the grain. See stack-stand.

stack-guard (stăk'gärd), n. A covering for a haystack or rick, whether for the top or the exposed side. Sometimes it is suspended from posts temporarily set up.

Stackhousia (stăk-hou'si-ä), n. [NL. (Sir J. E. Smith, 1798), named after John Stackhouse, an English botanist (died 1819).] A genus of plants, type of the order Stackhousiæ. It consists of about 20 species, all Australian except 2, which are natives, one of New Zealand, the other of the Philippine Islands. They are small herbs with a perennial herbaceous or woody rootstock, producing unbranched or slightly divided flower-bearing stems and alternate linear or spatulate leaves, which are entire and slightly fleshy or coriaceous. The flowers are white or yellow, borne in spikes terminating the branches, or in clusters along the main stem. Each flower consists of a small three-bracted calyx, an elongated often gamopetalous corolla with five included stamens, a thin disk, and a free ovary with from two to five styles or style-branches.

Stackhousiæ (stăk-hou-si-ä-ä), n. pl. [NL. (H. G. L. Reichenbach, 1828), < Stackhousia + -æ.] An order of plants, of the polypetalous series Discifloræ and cohort Celastrales. It is characterized by a hemispherical calyx-tube, having five imbricated lobes, five erect imbricated and often united petals, and as many alternate stamens. From the related orders Celastrinææ and Rhamnaceæ it is especially distinguished by its lobed ovary, which is sessile, roundish, and from two- to five-celled, and ripens from two to five indehiscent globose or angled one-seeded carpels, which are smooth, reticulated, or broadly winged. It consists of the genus Stackhousia and the monotypic Australian genus Macgregoria. Also Stackhousiaceæ.

stacking-band (stăk'ing-band), n. A band or rope used in binding thatch or straw on a stack.

stacking-belt (stăk'ing-belt), n. Same as stacking-band.

stacking-stage (stăk'ing-stäj), n. A scaffold or stage used in building stacks.

stack-room (stăk'rôm), n. In libraries, a room devoted to stacks of book-shelves; a book-room.

stack-stand (stăk'stând), n. A basement of timber or masonry, sometimes of iron, raised on props and placed in a stack-yard, on which to build a stack. Its object is to keep the lower part of the stack dry, and exclude vermin. Such stands are more common in European countries than in the United States.

stack-yard (stăk'yărd), n. [< stack¹ + yard². Cf. slag-yard².] A yard or inclosure for stacks of hay or grain.

< Gr. στακτή, the

which composed the holy incense of the ancient Jews. Two kinds have been described—one, the fresh gum of the myrrh tree, Balsamodendron Myrrha, mixed with water and squeezed out through a press; the other, the resin of the storax, Styrax officinale, mixed with wax and fat.

Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and stactometer (stăk-tom'e-tēr), n. [Also stak- tometer; < Gr. στακτός, dropping, oozing out (see stacte), + μέτρον, a measure.] A glass tube having a bulb in the middle, and tapering to a fine orifice at one end, used for ascertaining the number of drops in equal bulks of different liquids. Also called stalagmometer.

stad¹. A Middle English form of the past participle of stead.

stadda (stăd'ä), n. [Origin obscure.] A double-bladed hand-saw, used for cutting comb-teeth.

Also called steady.

stadholder (stăd'hôl'dér), n. [Also spelled stadtholder (= F. stadhouder); a partial accommodation of MD. stadhouder, a deputy, legate, vicar, substitute, lieutenant, esp. a viceroy, a governor of a province, esp. in Holland, in later stadholder, n. [The false spelling stadholder is sometimes used to be D. stadhouder, the Dutch name for the posthumous of the stadholder. It is not, due to the fact that the Dutch name is now obsolete. The stadholder is not the 'keeper of the keys'. Formerly, in the Netherlands, the governor or lieutenant-governor of a province or a royal province of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.]

stadholderate (stad'hol'der-ät), n. [Also spelled stadtholderate (= F. stadtholderat); < stadholder + -ate.] The office of a stadholder. See stadholder, July 20, 1889, p. 32.

stadia (stä'di-ä), n. [< ML. stadia, a station, a term form, orig. pl. of the neut. stadium, a stage, station, stadium; see stadium.] 1. A station temporarily occupied in surveying.— 2. An instrument for measuring distances by means of the angle subtended by an object of known dimensions. The instrument commonly so called intended for rough military work in action, consists of a small glass plate with figures of horsemen and foot-soldiers as they appear at marked distances, or with two lines nearly horizontal but converging, crossed by vertical lines marked with the distances at which a man appears of the height between the first lines.

3. In card and topographical engines, the method or the instruments by which what are called stadia measurements are made. This use is almost exclusively limited to the United States, where this method of measuring distances is extensively employed. Stadia measurements are based on the geometrical principle that the lengths of parallel lines subtending an angle are proportional to their distances from the apex of that angle. The essential appliances for this kind of work are a pair of the horizontal wires (which are usually of platinum, but which may be spider-wires, or even lines ruled or photographed on the glass), in addition to the ordinary horizontal and vertical wires in the diaphragm of a telescope, and a staff or graduated rod (the stadia rod)—these giving the means of measuring with considerable precision the angle subtended by the whole or any part of a vertical staff, and thus furnishing the data for determining the distance of the rod from the point of sight. This may be accomplished by making the subtending angle variable (that is, by making the wires movable) and the space on the staff fixed in length, or by having the angle constant (that is, the wires fixed in position) and reading off a varying length on the staff; the latter is the method now most generally used. The wires may be applied to the telescope of any suitable instrument, as a theodolite or transit theodolite, but the method is especially well adapted for use in plane-tableing, the wires being inserted in the telescope of the alidade. This arrangement has been extensively used in the United States, and has given excellent results. The intervals between the wires are frequently arranged so that at a distance of 100 feet a space of one foot shall be intercepted on the rod; but there are also instruments made in which the number of wires is increased, the method of reading varying accordingly.

stadier, n. [ME. < L. stadium, a race-course, a furlong; see *stad*², stadium.] A race-course; a stadium.

Yif a man remeth in the stadie or in the forlonge for the corone, than leth the mede in the corone for whiche he remeth. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 3.

stadimeter (stä-di-om'e-tër), n. [< Gr. stadion (see stadium) + metron, measure.] A modified theodolite in which the directions are not read off, but marked upon a small sheet, which is changed at each station. The distances as read on the telemeter can also be laid down. The stadimeter differs from the plane-table in that the alidade cannot be moved relatively to the sheet.

stadium (stä'di-um), n.; pl. stadia (-ä). [< L. stadium, < Gr. stadion, a fixed standard of length, specifically 600 Greek feet (see def. 1), a furlong (nearly), hence a race-course of this length, lit. 'that which stands fast,' < istáira (√ στα), stand; see stand. Cf. *stade*², stadie.] 1. A Greek itinerary unit, originally the distance between successive stations of the shouters and runners employed to estimate distances. The stadium of Eratosthenes seems to have been short of 520 English feet; but the stadium at the race-course at Athens has been found to be between 603 and 610 English feet. The Roman stadium was about the same length, being one eighth of a Roman mile.

Hence—2. A Greek course for foot-races, disposed on a level, with sloping banks or tiers of seats for spectators rising along its two sides and at one end, which was typically of semi-circular plan. The course proper was exactly a stadium in length. The most celebrated stadia were those of Olympia and Athens. The latter has been, in great part, destroyed.

3. A stage; period; in med., a stage or period of a disease, especially of an intermittent disease.

My lord, I was now free once more; but he no longer thought of giving me his polemic against the Meccans or of seeking to influence them at all. In his relations to them he was to be distinguished, although it is easier to determine their character than their chronology. Engel, Brit., XVI. 560.

stadlet, n. An obsolete form of staddle.

Stadmannia (stad-man'i-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1823), named after Stadmann, a German botanical traveler.] A genus of trees, of the order Sapindaceæ and tribe Nepheleeæ. It is distinguished from the nearly related genus Nephelium (which see) by the absence of petals and by a somewhat spherical calyx with five broad obtuse teeth, by warty branches, and by small velvety plum-like berries. The only species, S. Sideroxylon, is a native of Mauritius and Bourbon. It has alternate abruptly pinnate leaves with from three to six pairs of oblong obtuse leaflets, oblique at the base, each leaflet narrow, entire, smooth, and finely reticulated. The small pedicelled flowers form axillary branching panicles, with conspicuous long-exserted erect stamens. It is known as Bourbon ironwood. See Macassar oil, under oil.

stadtholder, stadtholderate (stä'thöl'dër, -ät), etc. Erroneous spellings of stadholder, etc.

staff (stäf), n.; pl. staves, stafes (stävz, stäfs). [< ME. staff, stafle, staf (gen. staves, dat. stave, pl. staves); < AS. staf, in a very early form staf, pl. stafas, a stick, staff, twig, letter (see etym. of book); = OS. staf = OFries. stef = D. staf = MLG. Gael. stob, a stake, stump; prob. related to OHG. staben, be stiff, from an extended form of the root sta of stand: see stand. Not connected with L. stipes, a stock, post, which is cognate with E. stiff. Hence stave, q. v.] 1. A stick or pole. Specifically—(a) A stick used as a walking-stick, especially one five or six feet long used as a support in walking or climbing.

In his hand a staf. Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 495.

He [the pilgrim] had a long staf in his hand with a nobbe in the middle, according to the fashion of those Pilgrims staves. Coryat, Crudities, l. 20.

(b) A stick used as a weapon, as that used at quarter-staff; a club; a cudgel.

A god-to-hande staf therowt he hent,
Before Roben he lepe.
Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 20).

The wars are doubtful;

And on our horsemen's staves Death looks as grimly

As on your keen-edg'd swords.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, i. 1.

(c) A stick used as an ensign of authority; a baton or scepter. Compare baton, club, naecl.

The Earl of Worcester

Hath broke his staf, resign'd his stewardship.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 2. 59.

(d) A post fixed in the ground; a stake.

The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staf.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 203.

(e) A pole on which to hoist and display a flag; as, a flag-staff; an ensign-staff; a jack-staff.

The flag of Norway and the cross of St. George floated from separate staves on the lawn.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 295.

(f) The pole of a vehicle; a carriage-pole.

His newe lady holdeth him so narowe
Up by the byrd, at the staves ende,
That every word he dred it as an arrowe.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 184.

(g) The long handle of certain weapons, as a spear, a halberd, or a poleax.

There stuck no plume in any English crest
That is removed by a staf of France.
Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 318.

Their staves upon their rests they lay.
Drayton, Nymphidia.

(h) A straight-edge for testing or truing a line or surface; as, the proof-staff used in testing the face of the stone in a grind-mill. (i) In surv., a graduated stick, used in leveling. See cross-staff, Jacob's-staff, and cut under leveling-staff. (j) One of several instruments formerly used in taking the sun's altitude at sea: as, the fore-staff, back-staff, cross-staff. See these words. (k) In ship-building, a measuring and spacing rule. (l) The stilt of a plow.

2. In surv., a grooved steel instrument having a curvature, used to guide the knife or gorget through the urethra into the bladder in the operation of lithotomy.—3. In arch., same as rudenture.—4. Something which upholds or supports; a support; a prop.

He is a staf of stedfastnes bothe erly & latte
To chastes sicke kaytyfes as don ayenst the lawe.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 3.

The boy was the very staf of my age, my very prop.
Shak., M. of V., ii. 2. 70.

Bread is the staf of life.
Swift, Tale of a Tub, iv.

5. A round of a ladder. Latham.—6. A body of assistants or executive officers. (a) Milit., a body of officers who are not in command of troops, but who act as the assistants of an officer in high command, sometimes including that officer himself. Thus, the regimental staff consists of the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, and adjutant, or the officers corresponding to these ranks, the brigade staff and division staff are composed of aides-de-camp, commissaries, quartermasters, and the like; and the staff of a general commanding an army-corps, or an army composed of several army-corps, includes these last-named officers and also a chief of staff, a chief of artillery, a chief engineer, and the like. The general staff is a body of officers forming the central office of the army of a nation, and it acts, in a sense, as the personal staff of the commander-in-chief, or of the king or other chief ruler. In the United States navy, staff-officers are the non-combatants, comprising the medical corps, the pay-corps, the steam-engineering corps, and chaplains, of those who go to sea, as well as civil engineers, naval constructors, and professors of mathematics. (b) A body of executive officers attached to any establishment for the carrying out of its designs, or a number of persons, considered as one body, intrusted with the execution of any undertaking; as, the editorial and reporting staff of a newspaper; the staff of the Geological Survey; a hospital staff.

The Archbishop [Becket] had amongst his chaplains a staff of professors on a small scale.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 143.

7. A letter of the alphabet. See etymology of book.

The first staf iss nemmedd I. Ormulum, l. 4312.

8. A line; a verse; also, a stanza.

Nerehande staf by staf, by gret diligence, Saying that I most metre apply to;
The wordes meue, and set here & ther.
Rom of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6555.

If we consider well the forme of this Poetical staf, we shall finde it to be a certain number of verses allowed to go altogether and ioyne without any intermission, and doe or should finish vp all the sentences of the same with a full period.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 54.

I can sing but one staf of the ditty neither.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, ii. 1.

Cowley found out that no kind of staf is proper for a heroic poem, as being all too lyrical.

Dryden.

9. In musical notation, a set of five horizontal lines on which notes are placed so as to indicate the pitch of intended tones. Both the lines and the spaces between them are significant, and are called degrees: they are numbered from below upward. When the nine degrees of the staff are understood to correspond to the successive degrees of the scale or to the successive white keys of the keyboard, irrespective of the fact that the intervals thus indicated are not equal to each other. An absolute pitch for the staff-degrees is indicated by a clef placed at the beginning. (See clef.) Gregorian music is customarily written on a staff of four lines, and the only clef used is the C clef. The staff with its appropriate notation is a development from the early medieval neumes, which were originally dots, dashes, or compound marks, whose relative position or shape indicated the relative pitch of successive tones. To make this notation more precise a horizontal line was drawn across the page to mark the pitch of some given tone, as C or F, and the neumes were arranged above or below this line. Later, a second line was added, and then others, only the lines being at first regarded as significant. What was called the great or grand staff was such a staff of eleven lines. In harmonic or concerted music, two or more staves are used together, and are connected by a brace. See brace, 5, and score, 9. Also stave, especially in Great Britain.

10. In her., same as fissure, 5.—Bishop's staff.

See crozier, 1.—Cantor's staff, cantor's staff, the official staff of a cantor or precentor: it is primarily the baton with which he beats time, but is often large, and elaborately ornamented, becoming a mere badge of office. Also called baton.—David's staff, a kind of quadrant formerly used in navigation.—Episcopal staff, in her., the representation of a bishop's or pastoral staff, usually entwined with a bandlerole which is secured to the shaft below the head. See cut under bandlerole.—Foliferous staff. See foliferous.—Jeddard staff, a form of battle-axe used by mounted men-at-arms: so named from the town of Jedburgh, in Scotland, the arms of which bear such a weapon. Also called Jedward ax. Fairholt.—Marshall's staff. See marshal.—Northern staff, a quarter-staff.—Palmer's staff, in her., same as bouillon, 3.—Papal staff, in her., a staff topped with the papal cross of three cross-bars.—Pastoral staff, a staff borne as an emblem of episcopal authority by or before bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses. In the Western Church it is usually headed with a volute, suggesting a shepherd's crook, and in the Greek Church it generally has a T-shaped head, often curved upward and inward at the ends; in the Roman Catholic and some other churches it bears a cross in the case of an archbishop, and a double cross in the case of a patriarch. See cambuca, crozier, patresca, sudarium.—Pilgrim's staff. See pilgrim.—Red staff, in mill, a straight-edge used to test the dress of a mill stone. It is so called because it is rubbed with red chalk or ochre, by means of which inequalities on the surface of the stone are detected.—Ring-and-staff investiture. See ecclesiastical investiture, under investiture.—Short staff, the cudgel used in ordinary cudgel-play, similar to the modern singlestick as distinguished from quarter-staff. Staff raguly, in her., either a pallet coupled raguly, or the representation of a trunk of a tree with short projections on the opposite sides, as of limbs sawed off.—

To argue from the staff to the corner¹, to raise some other question than that under discussion. Abb. Bramhall, Works, II. 94. (Davies). To break a staff. Same as to break a lance (which see, under break).—To go to sticks and staves. See sticks. To have the better or worse end of the staff, to be getting the best or worst of a matter.

And so now ours seem to have the better end of the staff. Court and Times of Charles I., II. 94.

To set down (or up) one's staff, to stop and rest, as a traveler at an inn; abide for a time. Ier. P. Adams, Works, I. 185. (Davies) See crook, crozier, crutch.

staff² (stáf), n. Plaster of Paris mixed, in water, with some cement, glycerin, and dextrine: used as a building material. It was first employed at the Paris Exposition of 1878, and was extensively used in the construction of the buildings of the Chicago Exposition in 1893.

staff-angle (stáf'ang'gl), n. In plastering, a square rod of wood, standing flush with the wall on each of its sides, at the external angles of plastering, to protect them from injury.

staff-bead (stáf'béd), n. In arch., an angle-bead.

staff-captain (stáf'kap'tān), n. The senior grade in the navigating branch of the British navy.

staff-commander (stáf'kō-mān'dér), n. The second grade in the navigating branch of the British navy. See master¹, 1 (b).

staff-degree (stáf'dē-grē'), n. In musical notation, a degree of a staff, whether line or space.

staff-duty (stáf'dū'ti), n. The occupation or employment of an officer who serves on a staff, especially of one who, not originally a staff-officer, has been detached from his regiment, and attached to a staff.

staffed (stáf't), a. [< staff + -ed]. 1. In her., surrounded or combined with staffs: as, an annulet staffed, a ring from which staffs or scepters radiate.—2. Provided with a staff or body of officers; officered. [Recent.]

staffelite (stáf'e-lit), n. [< Staffel (see def.) + -ite]. A somewhat altered apatite, occurring in botryoidal reniform shapes of a green color, incrusting the phosphorite found at Staffel, near the Lahn, in Prussia.

staff-herding (stáf'hér'ding), n. In old Eng. forest law, the grazing of cattle in charge of a herdsman. This was restrained or forbidden as more injurious to the herds of deer than if there were no herdsman to drive away the deer, and the cattle had to find their own feeding-ground.

staff-hole (stáf'hōl), n. In metal., a small hole in a puddling-furnace through which the puddler heats his staff. Wcale.

staffier† (stáf'ier), n. [= D. staffier, an attendant, < OF. estaffier, a lackey, footboy that runs by the stirrup, etc., < It. staffiere, staffiero, a lackey, footboy, < staffa, a stirrup (ML. staffa) (> dim. staffetta, a little stirrup, a courier, > Sp. Pg. staffetta = F. estafette, > D. estafette = G. staffette = Sw. staffett = Dan. stafet, a courier, < OHG. staffio, staffio, MHG. G. staffe, a footstep (also a stirrup?), < OHG. MHG. stepfen, also OHG. staffon, MHG. staffen, step, tread, = E. step: see step, and cf. OBulg. stopa, a spur. The notion reflected on the def. as given in most dictionaries, that staffier means a 'staff-bearer,' and is connected with staff, is erroneous.] A footman; an attendant.

Before the dame, and round about,
March'd whiffers and staffiers on foot,
With lackies, grooms, valets, and pages,
In fit and proper equipages.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 650.

staffish† (stáf'ish), a. [In Se. corruptly staffage; < staff + -ish]. Like a staff; rigid; hence, intractable. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 111.

staff-man (stáf'mān), n. A workman employed in silk-throwing.

staff-notation (stáf'nō-tā'shon), n. In musical notation, the entire system of signs used in connection with the staff: opposed, for example, to the tonic sol-fa notation, in which no staff is used.

staff-officer (stáf'of'is-ér), n. An officer forming part of the staff of a regiment, brigade, army, or the like; in the United States navy, an officer not exercising military command.

staff-sergeant (stáf'sār'jēnt), n. A non-commissioned officer having no position in the ranks of a company, but attached to the staff of a regiment. In the United States service the staff-sergeants are the sergeant-major, ordnance-sergeant, hospital-steward, quartermaster-sergeant, and commissary-sergeant.

staff-sling† (stáf'sling), n. [ME. staffeslyng, staffslinge; < staff + sling]. A weapon consisting of a sling combined with a short staff. The staff was held with both hands and whirled around. The weapon seems to have thrown larger missiles than the ordinary sling and with greater force. Distinguished from cord-sling. Also called fustibale, fustibulus.

This geaunt at him stones caste
Out of a fel staf-slinge.

Chaucer, Sir Thopas, I. 118.

staff-stone (stáf'stōn), n. Same as baedrite.

staff-striker† (stáf'strī'kēr), n. A sturdy beggar; a tramp.

Many became staff-strikers,
... and wandered in parties of two, three, and four from village to village. R. Eden, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Va- grants and Vagrancy, p. 53.

staff-surgeon (stáf'sér'jōn), n. A senior grade of surgeons in the British navy.

staff-tree (stáf'trē), n. A vine or tree of the genus Celastrus. The best-known species is the American C. scandens, a twiner with ornamental fruit, otherwise named climbing bitter-sweet, wax-work, staff-vine, and fever-tree (see the last, and cut under bittersweet). The seeds of the East Indian C. paniculata have long been in repute among Hindu physicians for their stimulating and acrid properties, and are applied externally or internally for the relief of rheumatism, etc. They yield an expressed oil, also an empyreumatic, known as oleum nigrum.

staff-vine (stáf'vīn), n. See staff-tree.

stag (stag), n. [E. dial. also steg, Sc. also staig; early mod. E. stagg, stagge; < ME. steg, stagge, < Icel. steggr, steggi, a male animal (a male fox, cat, a gander, drake, etc.), lit. 'mounter,' < stiga = AS. stigan, mount: see styl. Hence *staggard*¹, staggon]. 1. The male of various animals, especially of the deer tribe. Specifically—(a) The male red-deer or a deer of other large species of the genus Cervus in a restricted sense; a hart, of which the female is a hind; and particularly the adult hart, at least five years old, with antlers fully developed (compare *staggard*¹, and see cuts under antler); in heraldry, a horned deer with branched antlers. The stag of Europe is Cervus elaphus, now found wild in Great Britain only in the Highlands of Scotland. It is a magnificent animal, standing 4 feet high at the shoulder, with the antlers 3 feet long, having sometimes ten points and palmed at the crown: sometimes known as a stag of ten. The hind is hornless and smaller. The corresponding animal in North America is the wapiti, there called elk (Cervus canadensis), larger than the European stag, with much-branched antlers sometimes upward of 4 feet long, not palmed at the end. (See cut under wapiti.) There are several Asiatic stags, among them the rusine deer (see *Rusa*¹, sambur). (b) A bull castrated when half-grown or full-grown; a bull-stag; a bull-segg. (c) A male fox; a dog-fox. (d) A young horse; a colt (sometimes a filly). (e) A gander. (f) A drake. (g) A pit or exhibition game-cock less than one year old; the cockerel of the game-fowl. (h) A turkey-cock. (i) The wren. [Local, Eng.] (j) A stag-beetle. [In most of these uses prov. Eng.]

2. In com. slang: (a) An outside irregular dealer in stocks, not a member of the exchange. (b) A person who applies for the allotment of shares in a joint-stock company, not because he wishes to hold the shares, but because he hopes to sell the allotment at a premium. If he fails in this he forbears to pay the deposit, and the allotment is forfeited.—3. A romping girl; a hoyden. [Prov. Eng.].—4. The color of the stag; a red dirty-brown color.

Come, my Cub, doe not scorn me because I go in Stag, in Buße; heer's veluet too; thou seest I am worth thus much in bare velvet.

Dekker, Satiromastix, I. 220 (ed. Pearson).

Royal stag, a stag that has antlers terminating in twelve or more points.

stag (stag), v.; pret. and pp. staggd, ppr. staggng. [< stag, n.] I. intrans. In com. slang, to act as a stag on the stock exchange. See stag, n., 2.

II. trans. To follow warily, as a deer-stalker does a deer; dog; watch. [Slang.]

So you've been staggng this gentleman and me, and listening, have you?
H. Kingsley, Geoffrey Hamlyn, v. (Davies).

stagar†, n. An obsolete spelling of *staggard*¹.

stag-beetle (stag'bē'tl), n. A lamellicorn coleopterous insect of the genus Lucanus or restricted family Lucanidae (which see), the males of which have branched mandibles resembling the antlers of a stag. L. cervus is the common stag-beetle of Europe, and L. elaphus is the stag-beetle of the United States. The former is one of the largest of British beetles, distinguished by the enormous size of the horny and toothed mandibles in the male, and by the rather long elbowed antennae, which end in a perfoliated club, and are composed of ten joints, the first being very long. It is common in some localities in the neighborhood of London, and is often 2 inches long, of a black color. Other species are numerous in various parts of the world. See also cut under Platycerus.

Staff-sling, about the 10th century. From Viollet le Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français."

Stag-beetle (Lucanus cervus), one half natural size.

stag-bush (stag'būsh), n. The black haw, Viburnum prunifolium.

stag-dance (stag'dāns), n. A dance performed by men only. [Colloq., U. S.] stage (stāj), n. [*< ME. stage, < OF. estage, estage, estauge, astage, etc., a story, floor, stage, a dwelling-house, F. étage, story, stage, floor, loft, = Pr. estatge, a stage, = It. staggio, a stake, prop. banisters (ML. reflex stagiū, estagiū), < ML. statiūm, lit. 'a place of standing,' or (as in It. staggio) 'that which stands,' < L. stare, pp. status, stand: see state, stand. Cf. étagère. In the sense of 'the distance between two points,' the word was prob. confused with OF. estage, < L. stadium, < Gr. στάδιον, a measure of distance: see stadium, stage², stadiē.] 1†. A floor or story of a house.

As sone as he myght to hiest stage came.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I. 4925.

Litul John stode at a window in the mornynge,
And lokid forth at a stage.
Robin Hood and the Monk (Child's Ballads, V. 8).

2†. A house; building.

Ther buth seriauns in the stage
That seruth the maidenes of parage.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 58.

3. In arch., the portion between a projection and the retreat next above it in a medieval buttress; also, one of the horizontal divisions of a window separated by transoms.—4. A floor or platform elevated above the ground or common surface, for the exhibition of a play or spectacle, for public speakers or performers, or for convenience of view, use, or access: as, a stage for a mountebank; a stage for speakers in public.

Give order that these bodies
High on a stage be placed to the view.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 389.

Specifically—(a) A floor elevated for the convenience of performing mechanical work and the like; a scaffold; a staging: as, seamen use floating stages, and stages suspended by the side of a ship, for calking and repairing. (b) In printing, a low platform on which stacks of paper are piled. (c) A shelf or horizontal compartment, as one of the steps of a court-cupboard.

The number of stages in the buffet or sideboard indicates the rank of the owner.

S. K. Handbook, Corporation and College Plate.

(d) The platform on which an object is placed to be viewed through a microscope. (e) A wooden structure on a beach to assist in landing; a landing-place at a quay or pier. It sometimes rises and falls with the tide, or is lowered or raised to suit the varying height of the water.

Getting ye starte of ye ships that came to the plantation, they took away their stage, & other necessary provisions that they had made for fishing at Cap-Anne ye year before.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 196.

(f) A raised platform on which theatrical performances are exhibited; the flooring in a theater on which the actors perform. In modern theaters the stage includes not only the part which can be seen from the auditorium, but also the spaces on each side, behind the proscenium-arch, which are used for shifting the wings or side-scenes, and are themselves called the wings. The part extending back from the orchestra to the proscenium-arch is called the proscenium. That side of the stage which is on the extreme left of the spectator is called the prompt-side, because in theaters which have no prompt-box the prompters stand there. The corresponding position to the spectator's right is called the opposite-prompt-side (or, briefly, o. p. side). Half-way between the center and the prompt-side is the prompt-center, the corresponding position to the successive steps in a course of development: as, the several pupal and imaginal stages of an insect; several stages of an embryo.

Floor plan of Stage.

A, proscenium; B, C, D, first, second, and third prompt-entrances respectively; B, C, D, first, second, and third opposite-prompt-entrances respectively; E, wings; a, center; b, b, prompt-side; o, o, side; d, d, prompt-center; e, e, o, o, center.

A blyskal lyf thou says I lede,
Thou woldest know ther-of the stage.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 410.

all stage-carriages to one farthing.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 56.

stage-coach (stāj'kōch), n. A coach that runs by stages; a coach that runs regularly every day or on stated days between two places, for the conveyance of passengers. Also stage.

stage-craft (stāj'kräft), n. 1. The art of dramatic composition.

The fact that their author so willingly leaned upon the plot of a predecessor indicates his weak point—the lack of that stage-craft which seems to be still one of the rarest gifts of Englishmen. A. Dobson, Introd. to Steele, p. xlv.

2. Knowledge and skill in putting a play on the stage.

stage-direction (stāj'di-rek'shən), n. A written or printed instruction as to action, etc., perienced on facing an audience, especially for the first time.

stage-hand (stāj'händ), n. A man employed to move scenery, etc.

stage-house (stāj'hous), n. A house, as an inn, at which a coach stops regularly for passengers or to change horses.

stagely (stāj'li), a. [< stage + -ly.] Pertaining to the stage; befitting the theater; theatrical. Jos. Taylor (2). Artif. Handsomeness,
p. 168.

stage-man (stāj'man), n. An actor. T. Brabaine, 1589 (prefixed to Greene's "Menaphon").
(Davies.)

stage-manager (stāj'man'āj-ēr), n. In theaters, one who superintends the production and performance of a play, and who regulates all matters behind the curtain.

stage-micrometer (stāj'mi-krom'e-ter), n. In microscopy, a micrometer attached to the stage, and used to measure the size of an object under examination.

stage-plate (stāj'plāt), n. A glass plate with a narrow ledge along one edge, used on the stage of a microscope to hold an object when the microscope is inclined, and sometimes as the bottom plate of a growing-slide. *E. H.
Knight*.

stage-play (stāj'plā), n. Originally, a dramatic performance; hence, a play or drama adapted for representation on the stage, as distinguished from a reading- or closet-play.

If the devil, or his instruments, should then tell him [a dying man] of a cup of sack, of merry company, of a stage-play, or a morris-dance, do you think he would then be so taken with the motion? Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 3.

stage-player (stāj'plā'ēr), n. An actor on the stage; one whose occupation is to represent characters on the stage.

Among slaves who exercised polite arts none sold so dear as stageplayers or actors. Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins.

stager (stāj'ēr), n. [< stage + -er.] 1. A player.

Dare quit, upon your oaths,
The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your peers).
B. Jonson, Just Indignation of the Author.

2. One who has long acted on the stage of life;
a person of experience, or of skill derived from long experience: usually with old.

Here let me, as an old stager upon the theatre of the world, suggest one consideration to you.

Chesterfield, To his Son, Dec. 20, O. S. 1748.

3. A horse used for drawing a stage-coach.

stage-right (stāj'rit), n. The proprietary right of the author of a dramatic composition in respect to its performance; the exclusive right to perform or authorize the performance of a particular drama. Compare copyright.

stagerite, n. [< stager + -ite; with a pun on Stagirite.] A stage-player. [Humorous.]

Thou hast forgot how thou ambled . . . by a play-wagon, in the high way, and took'st mad Jeronimes part, to get service among the Mimicks; and when the Stager-ites banish't thee into the Isle of Dogs, thou turn'st Ban-dog.

Dekker, Satiromastix, I. 229 (ed. Pearson).

stagery† (stāj'jēr-i), n. [< stage + -ery.] Exhibition on the stage.

Likening those grave controversies to a piece of Stagery, or Scene-work. Milton, An Apology, etc.

stage-setter (stāj'set'ēr), n. One who attends to the proper setting of a play on the stage.

M. Sardou is a born stage-setter, but with a leaning to "great machines," numbers of figurants, and magnificence.
The Century, XXXV. 544.

stage-struck (stāj'struk), a. Smitten with a love for the stage; possessed by a passion for the drama; seized by a passionate desire to become an actor.

"You are a precious fool, Jack Bunce," said Cleveland, half angry, and, in despite of himself, half diverted by the false tones and exaggerated gesture of the stagestruck pirate. Scott, Pirate, xxxix.

stag-evil (stag'ē'vl), n. Tetanus or lockjaw of the horse.

stage-wagon (stāj'wag'on), n. 1. A wagon for conveying goods and passengers, by stages, at regularly appointed times.—2. A stage-coach.

cal performance, due to dilatoriness of an actor or carpenter, or to any like cause. [Colloq.]

stage-whisper (stāj'hwis'pēr), n. A loud whisper used in by-play by an actor in a theater; an aside; hence, a whisper meant to be heard by those to whom it is not professedly addressed.

stagewright (stāj'rit), n. A dramatic author;
a playwright. See the quotation under stager, i.
[Rare.]

stagey, stageyness. See stagy, staginess, i.

*staggard*¹, staggart (stag'ārd, -ārt), n. [Formerly also staggart; < stag + -ard, -art.] A stag in his fourth year, and therefore not quite full grown.

*staggard*² (stag'ārd), n. Same as staggard.

staggarth (stag'ārth), n. [Also staggard; a reduction of stack-garth*, *< stack + garth*¹. Cf.
equiv. dial. haggarth, haggard, 'hay-garth'.]
An inclosure within which stacks of hay and grain are kept. Cath. Ang., p. 358. [Prov. Eng.]

stagger (stag'ēr), v. [A var. of stacker, after MD. staggeren, stagger as a drunken man (ap-par. a var. of stuckeren* = leel. stakra, stagger); see *stucker*¹.] I. intrans. 1. To walk or stand unsteadily; reel; totter.

A violent exertion, which made the King stagger backward into the hall. Scott, Quentin Durward, x.

stage (stāj', v.: pret. and pp. staged, pp. staged, [staj], n.) I. trans. 1. To represent in a play or on the stage; exhibit on the stage.
2. To place or put on the stage; mount, as a play.
The manager who, in staging a play, suggests judicious modifications, is in the position of a critic, nothing more.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 819.

II. intrans. To travel by stage-coach: sometimes with indefinite it.

He seasons pleasure with profit: he stages (if I may say so) into politics, and rides post into business.
Gentleman Instructed, p. 546. (Davies.)

stage-box (stāj'boks), n. A proscenium-box.
stage-carriage (stāj'kar'āj), n. A stage-coach.

In 1866 Gladstone was able to reduce the mileage for all stage-carriages to one farthing.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Galileo, Milton, and a Dominican.
2. To hesitate; begin to doubt or waver in purpose; falter; become less confident or determined; waver; vacillate.

He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief. Rom. iv. 20.

It was long since resolved on,
Nor must I stagger now in it.

Massinger, Unnatural Combat, ii. 1.
The enterprise of the . . . newspapers stops at no expense, staggers at no difficulties.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 687.
=Syn. 1. Totter, etc. See *reel*2.

II. trans. 1. To cause to reel, totter, falter, or be unsteady; shake.

I have seen enough to stagger my obedience.
Fletcher, Valentinian, iii. 1.

Strikes and lock-outs occur, which stagger the prosperity, not of the business merely, but of the state.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 515.

2. To cause to hesitate, waver, or doubt; fill with doubts or misgivings; make less steady, determined, or confident.

The question did at first so stagger me,
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 212.

'Tis not to die, sir,
But to die unreveng'd, that staggers me.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 1.

3. To arrange in a zigzag order; specifically, in wheel-making, to set (the spokes) in the hub alternately inside and outside (or more or less to one side of) a line drawn round the hub.

The mortise-holes in such a hub are said to be dodging. A wheel made in this manner is called a staggered wheel. The objects sought in this system of construction are increased strength and stiffness in the wheel.

stagger (stag'ér), n. [< stagger, v.] 1. A sudden tottering motion, swing, or reel of the body as if one were about to fall, as through tripping, giddiness, or intoxication.

Their trepidations are more shaking than cold ague-fits; their staggers worse than a drunkard's.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 127.
The individual . . . advanced with a motion that alternated between a reel and a stagger.

G. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures, The Ship-Chandler. (Latham.)

2. pl. One of various forms of functional and organic disease of the brain and spinal cord in domesticated animals, especially horses and cattle: more fully called blind staggers. A kind of staggers (see also *gid*1 and *sturdy*2) affecting sheep is specifically the disease resulting from a larval brain-worm. (See cenure and Tæniid.) Other forms are due to disturbance of the circulation in the brain, and others again to digestive derangements. See stomach-staggers.

How now! my gallowsy nag the staggers, ha!

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iv. 3.

Hence—3. pl. A feeling of giddiness, reeling, or unsteadiness; a sensation which causes reeling.

Johp. And a kind of whimsie—Mere. Here in my head, that puts me to the staggers.
B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

4. pl. Perplexities; doubts; bewilderment; confusion.

I will throw thee from my care for ever,
Into the staggers and the careless lapse
Of youth and ignorance.

Shak., All's Well, ii. 3. 170.

Blind staggers. See def. 2, above.—Grass-staggers, the loco-disease in horses. See loco, 2, and loco-weed.

stagger-bush (stag'ér-bûsh), n. The shrub Andromeda (Pieris) Mariana of the middle and southern United States, whose leaves have been supposed to give the staggers to animals. Its fascicles of waxy pure-white or pinkish urn-shaped flowers are very beautiful, the habit of the bush less so. See cut in preceding column.

staggerer (stag'ér-ér), n. [*< stagger + -er*1.] 1. One who or that which staggers.—2. A statement or argument that staggers; a poser; whatever causes one to stagger, falter, hesitate, or doubt. [Colloq.]

This was a staggerer for Dive's literary "gent," and it took him nearly six weeks to get over it and frame a reply. Athenæum, Oct. 26, 1889, p. 560.

stagger-grass (stag'ér-gràs), n. The atamascolily, Zephyranthes atamasco: so called as supposed to cause staggers in horses.

staggeringly (stag'ér-ing-li), adv. In a staggering or reeling manner; with hesitation or doubt. [Imp. Diet.] staggerwort (stag'ér-wèrt), n. Same as staverwort: so called as supposed to cure the staggers, or, as Prior thinks, from its application to newly castrated bulls, called stags.

staggon (stag'on), n. [Also stagon (ML. staggon); < stag + -on, a suffix of F. origin.] A staggard. [Holinshead.]

Called in the fourth [year] a stagon. Stanikure, Descrip. of Eng., iii. 4.

stag-headed (stag'hed'ed), a. Having the upper branches dead: said of a tree.

They were made of particular parts of the growth of certain very old oaks, which had grown for ages, and had at length become stag-headed and half-dead.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 787.

stag-horn (stag'hörn), n. 1. A common club-moss, Lycopodium clavatum. Also stag's-horn.

Or with that plant which in our dale
We call stag-horn, or fox's tail.

Wordsworth, Idle Shepherd-Boys.

2. A madrepora coral, Madrepore cervicornis and related species, used for ornament. See cut under Madrepore.—Stag-horn fern, a fern of the genus Platycerium, but especially P. alcebrum: so called from the fact that the fertile fronds are dichotomously forked like a stag's horn. The genus is small but widely diffused. The name is also sometimes applied to certain species of Ophioglossum.—Stag-horn moss. Same as stag-horn, 1.—Stag-horn sumac. See sinac.

stag-horned (stag'hörnd), a. Having long serrate antennæ, as the longicorn beetle Acanthophorus serraticornis.

staghound (stag'hound), n. A hunting-dog able to overtake and cope with a stag. (a) The Scotch deerhound or wolf-dog, of great speed, strength, and courage, standing 28 inches or more, with a shaggy or wiry coat, usually some shade of gray. They hunt chiefly by sight, and are used in stalking the red deer, for running down the game. (b) A large kind of fox-hound, about 25 inches high, trained to hunt deer by scent.

staginess (stá'ji-nes), n. [*< stagy + -ness*1.] 1. Stagy or exaggerated character or style; conventional theatricality. Also stageyness.—2. A certain stage or state of an animal; by implication, that stage when the animal is out of condition, as when a fur-bearing animal is shedding. [Colloq.] staging (stá'jing), n. [Verbal n. of stage, v.] 1. A temporary structure of posts and boards for support, as in building; scaffolding.—2. The business of running or managing stage-coaches, or the act of traveling in them.

station, n. [Appar. an altered form of staging, simulating station (ME. stacion, < OF. stacion, estacion, estachon, estagon, etc.): see station.] Stage; a staging; a pier.

In these tydes there must be lost no lot of time, for, if you arrive not at the stations before the tyde be spent, you must turne backe from whence you came.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 234.

Stagirite (stá'ji-rit), n. [Also, erroneously, Stagyrite = F. Stagyrite = Sp. Pg. Estagirita = It. Stagirita, < L. Stagirites, Stagerites, < Gr. Σταγειρίτης, an inhabitant or a native of Stagira (applied esp. to Aristotle), < Σταγειρα, Σταγειρος (L. Stagira), a city of Macedonia.] A native or an inhabitant of Stagira, a city of Macedonia (Chalcidice), situated on the Strymonic Gulf; specifically, Aristotle, the "prince of philosophers" (384–322 B. C.), who was born there, and is frequently referred to as "the Stagirite."

The mighty Stagyrite first left the shore, Spread all his sails, and durst the deep explore;
He steer'd securely, and discover'd far,
Led by the light of the Mæonian star.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, I. 645.

stagnancy (stag'nán-si), n. [*< stagnan(t) + -cy*1.] 1. The state of being stagnant or without motion, flow, or circulation, as a fluid; stagnation.

There is nowhere stillness and stagnancy. The Century, XXVII. 174.

2. Pl. stagnancies (-siz). Anything stagnant; a stagnant pool.

Though the country people are so wise
To call these rivers, they're but stagnancies,

Cotton, Wonders of the Peaks (1681), p. 55.

stagnant (stag'nant), a. [< F. stagnant = It. stagnante, < L. stagnan(t)-s, ppr. of stagnare, form a pool of standing water, cause to stand: see stagnate.] 1. Standing; motionless, as the water of a pool or lake; without current or motion, ebb or flow: as, stagnant water; stagnant pools.

Where the water is stopped in a stagnant pond
Danced over by the midge.

Browning, By the Fireside.

2. Inert; inactive; sluggish; torpid; dull; not brisk: as, business is stagnant.

The gloomy slumber of the stagnant soul. Johnson.

stagnantly (stag'nant-li), adv. In a stagnant or still, motionless, inactive manner.

stagnate (stag'nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. stagnated, ppr. stagnating. [*< L. stagnatus, ppr. of stagnare (> It. stagnare = F. stagner), form a pool of standing water, stagnate, be overflowed, < stagnum, a pool, swamp. (cf. stank*1.)]

1. To cease to run or flow; be or become motionless; have no current.

I am fifty winters old;
Blood then stagnates and grows cold.

Cotton, Anacreontic.

In this flat country, large rivers, that scarce had declivity enough to run, crept slowly along, through meadows of fat black earth, stagnating in many places as they went.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 372.

2. To cease to be brisk or active; become dull, inactive, or inert: as, business stagnates.

Ready-witted tenderness . . . never stagnates in vain lamentations while there is room for hope. Scott.

stagnate (stag'nāt), a. [< L. stagnatus, ppr.: see the verb.] Stagnant.

To drain the stagnate fen. Somerville, The Chase, iii. 440.

stagnation (stag-nā'shon), n. [= F. stagnation; as *stagnate + -ion*1.] 1. The condition of being stagnant; the cessation of flow or circulation in a fluid; the state of being without flow, or of being motionless.

Th' icy touch
Of unprolific winter has impress'd
A cold stagnation on th' intestine tide.

Cowper, Task, vi. 139.

In . . . [suffocation] life is extinguished by stagnation of non-arterialized blood in the capillaries of the lungs, and by the changes that result from the failure of the function of the pulmonary system.

J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 396.

2. Lack or absence of briskness or activity; inertness; dullness.

The decay of my faculties is a stagnation of my life. Steele, Spectator, No. 260.

That none with victual should the town relieve.
Drayton, Battle of Agincourt, st. 89.

4. To divide or lay off and mark with stakes or posts; with out or off; as, to stake off a site for a school-house; to stake out oyster-beds.

The modest Northerners who have got hold of it [Florida], and staked it all out into city lots, seem to want to keep it all to themselves.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 49.

When, therefore, M. Naville disbanded his men at the close of the fourth week, he had not only found a large number of very precious monuments in a surprisingly short space of time, but he left the ground chronologically staked out.

The Century, XXXIX. 333.

5. To stretch, scrape, and smooth (skins) by friction against the blunt edge of a semicircular knife fixed to the top of a short beam or post set upright.

The [calf]-skins . . . are staked by drawing them to and fro over a blunt knife fixed on the top of a post.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 367.

stake² (stāk), n. [= MD. stacck, a stake for which one plays; a particular use of stake, a stake, pole, appar. as 'that which is fixed or put up': see *stake*¹, *stick*³.] 1. That which is placed at hazard as a wager; the sum of money or other valuable consideration which is deposited as a pledge or wager to be lost or won according to the issue of a contest or contingency.

'Tis time short Pleasures now to take,
Of little Life the best to make,
And manage wisely the Last Stake.

Cowley, Anacreontics, v.

Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones.
Byron, Age of Bronze, iii.

2. The prize in a contest of strength, skill, speed, or the like.

From the king's hand must Douglas take A silver dart, the archer's stake.

Scott, L. of the L., v. 22.

3. An interest; something to gain or lose.

Both had the air of men pretending to aristocracy — an old world air of respectability and stake in the country, and Church-and-Stateism.

Buwer, My Novel, xi. 2.

4. The state of being laid or pledged as a wager; the state of being at hazard or in peril: preceded by at: as, his honor is at stake.

Now begins the Game of Faction to be play'd, wherein the whole State of Queen Elizabeth lies at stake.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 329.

I have more than Life at Stake on your Fidelity.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, ii. 1.

5. The see or jurisdiction of a Mormon bishop. [A forced use.]

Inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not, . . . the sin be upon the heads of the parents.

stalactite (stā-lak'tit), n. [= F. stalactite, < NL. stalactites, < Gr. σταλακτός, dropping, oozing out in drops; see stalactic.] 1. A deposit of carbonate of lime, usually resembling in form a huge icicle, which hangs from the roof of a cave or subterranean rock-opening, where it has been slowly formed by deposition from calcareous water trickling downward through cracks or openings in the rocks above. Water containing carbonic acid in solution, which it has gained in filtering through the overlying soil, has the power of dissolving carbonate of lime, which it deposits again upon evaporation; stalactites are hence common in regions of limestone rocks. They are sometimes white, and nearly transparent, showing the broad cleavage-surfaces of the calcite, as those of the cave near Matanzas in Cuba; but commonly they have a granular structure with concentric bands of pale-yellow to brown colors. In some caverns the stalactites are very numerous and large, and of great beauty in their endless variety of form, especially in connection with the stalagmites, the corresponding depositions accumulated beneath the stalactites upon the floor of the caverns. The caves of Adelsberg in Carniola and of Luray in Virginia are among the most celebrated for the beauty of their stalactites.

The grotto is perfectly dry, and there are no petrifications or stalactites in it.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 41.

2. A similar form of some other mineral species, such as are occasionally observed, for example, of chalcodony, limonite, etc., but only sparingly and on a small scale.—3. A like form of lava sometimes observed in connection with volcanic outflows. Lava stalactites have been noted hanging from the roofs of lava caverns in the crater of Kilauea in Hawaii; and slender forms of a nearly uniform diameter of one fourth of an inch, and from a few inches to 20 or 30 inches in length, ornament the roofs of caverns in the lava stream which descended from Mauna Loa in the same island in 1881. Stalagmites of lava rise from the lava floor beneath.

stalactited (stā-lak'ti-ted), a. [< stalactite + -ed.] Covered with stalactites; also, formed in more or less semblance of stalactites.

Stalactited work. See rustic work, under rustic.

stalactitic (stal-ak-ti'tik), a. [< stalactic + -ic.] Containing stalactites; having the form of stalactites; as, in mineralogy, the stalactitic structure of limonite, chalcodony, and other species.

stalactical (stal-ak-ti'ti-kal), a. [< stalactitic + -al.] Same as stalactitic.

Stalactitic Structure of Limonite.

stalactitiform (stā-lak'ti-ti-fōrm), a. [< NL. stalactites + L. forma, form.] Same as stalactiform.

stalagmite (sta-lag'mit), n. [< F. stalagmite, < Gr. σταλαγμίς, dropping or dripping, σταλαγμία, that which drops, < σταλάζειν, drop, let fall drop by drop; see stalactic.] Carbonate of lime deposited on the floor of a cavern. See stalactite.

stalagmitic (stal-ag-mit'ik), a. [< stalagmite + -ic.] Composed of stalagmite, or having its character.

stalagmitical (stal-ag-mit'i-kal), a. [< stalagmitic + -al.] Stalagmitic in character or formation.

stalagmitically (stal-ag-mit'i-kali), adv. In the form or manner of stalagmite.

stalagmometer (stal-ag-mom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. σταλαγμός, a dropping or dripping (see stalagmite), + μέτρον, a measure.] Same as sluicemeter.

staldér (stāl'dēr), n. [Prob. < Icel. stallr, a stall, pedestal, shelf, = Dan. stald, a stall; see stall.] A wooden frame to set casks on.

The Unequal Stamens of Lagerstrœmia indica, the flower cut longitudinally.

cor or body of two cells placed side by side and filled with a powdery substance, the pollen. This pollen, when mature, is discharged from the anther through various openings or pores. Theoretically the stamen is the homologue of a leaf, in which the two cells of the anther represent the infolded halves of the blade, while the connective represents the midrib and the filament the petiole of the leaf. The pollen represents the parenchyma of the leaf. The stamens of a flower are collectively called the androeceum. When both stamens and pistils are present in the same flower it is said to be hermaphrodite or perfect; when only stamens are present the flower is said to be staminate or male. The number of stamens varies in different plants from one to one hundred or more, but is generally constant for the same species, and forms an important element in the system of classification. The classes in the Linnean sexual system were based upon the number and position of the stamens; and in the natural system they are still an important factor. In regard to their insertion, stamens may be hypogynous, epigynous, or perigynous, or the flower may be gynandrous (see these words). See also cuts under anther, anthophore, Androphorus, epigynous, extrorse, intorse, and many plant-names. — Barren stamen. Same as sterile stamen. — Included stamen. See include. — Stamina of reason. first truths. — Sterile stamen, in bot., an organ or body which belongs to the series of stamens, or androeceum, but which does not produce pollen; as the imperfect stamen, as that produced by certain plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ; a staminodium.

Stamened (stă'mend), a. [stamen + -ed².] Furnished with stamens.

Stamin[†], stamine[†] (stăm'in), n. [ME. stamin, stamyn, < OF. estamine, F. stamin, < ML. stamina, staminea, stamineum (also stamina, after OF.), a woolen cloth, bolting-cloth, < L. stamineus, consisting of threads, < stamen, a thread, fiber (> OF. estame = It. stame, yarn, worsted): see stamen. Tennyson, Maud, vi.

2. To stumble or stagger. [Prov. Eng.]
Stamerynge in goyng, idem quod stakerynge, waverynge.
Prompt. Parv., p. 472.

= Syn. 1. Falter, Stammer, Stutter. He who falters weakens or breaks more or less completely in utterance; the act is occasional, not habitual, and for reasons that are primarily moral, belong to the occasion, and may be various. He who stammers has great difficulty in uttering anything; the act may be occasional or habitual; the cause is confusion, shyness, timidity, or actual fear; the result is broken and inarticulate sounds that seem to stick in the mouth, and sometimes complete suppression of voice. He who stutters makes sounds that are not what he desires to make; the act is almost always habitual, especially in its worst forms; the cause is often excitement; the result is a quick repetition of some one sound that is in the initial of a word that the person desires to utter, as c-c-c-catch.—Stammering bladder, a bladder whose muscles act irregularly and spasmodically, causing painful urination. Paget.

II. trans. To utter or pronounce with hesitation or imperfectly; especially, to utter with involuntary breaks or catches: frequently with out.

His pale lips faintly stammered out a "No."
Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xxxiii.

stammer (stam'er), n. [< stammer, v.] Defective utterance; a stutter: as, to be troubled with a stammer. See stammering.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., i. 446.

3. To cause to strike the ground with a sudden or impetuous downward thrust.

Red Battle stamps his foot, and nations feel the shock.
Byron, Childe Harold, i. 38.

4. To impress a design or distinctive mark or figure upon; mark with an impression or design: as, to stamp plate with arms; to stamp letters; to stamp butter.

The Romanes were wont heretofore to stampe their coyens of gold and silver in this city.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 59.

Egmont dined at the Regent's table, . . . in a camlet doublet, with hanging sleeves, and buttons stamped with the bundle of arrows. Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 403.

Hence—5. To certify and give validity or currency to by marking with some mark or impression; coin; mint.

We pay . . . for it with stamped coin, not stabbing steel.
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 747.

6. Figuratively, to brand or stigmatize as being of a specified character; declare to be.

Dares stamp nothing false where he finds nothing sure.
M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna.

7. To imprint; impress; fix deeply: as, to stamp one's name on a book; an event stamped on one's memory.

If ever I an Hope admit Without thy Image stamp on it.
Cowley, The Mistress, The Soul.

God has stamped no original characters on our minds wherein we may read his being.
Locke.

8. To characterize; mark.

They [Macaulay's articles] are characterized by many of the qualities of heart and mind which stamp the productions of an Edinburgh reviewer.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 12.

9. To affix a stamp (as a postage- or receipt-stamp) to: as, to stamp a letter or a newspaper.—10. To cut, or cut into various forms, with a stamp: in this sense often with out: as, to stamp out circles and diamonds from a sheet of metal.

Stamped envelop. See envelop.—Stamped in the blind. See *blind*¹.—Stamped velvet, velvet or velveteen upon which a pattern has been impressed by hot irons which leave a surface more or less lowered from the pile according to the amount of pressure applied, etc. In some cases the surface of the impressed pattern is brought to a smooth gloss. This material is used chiefly for upholstery.—Stamped ware. Same as sigillated ware (which see, under sigillated). Solon, The Old Eng. Potter, p. xlii.—Stamped work, metal-work decorated by means of dies and punches.—To stamp out, to extinguish, as fire, by stamping on with the foot; hence, to extirpate; eradicate by resorting to vigorous measures; suppress entirely; exterminate: as, to stamp out disease which has broken out among cattle by killing the whole herd; to stamp out an insurrection.

II. intrans. To strike the foot forcibly downward.

A ramping fool, to brag and stamp and swear.
Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 122.

stamp (stamp), n. [OHG. stamph, stampf, MHG. stampf, a stamping-instrument, a stamp (> F. estampe = It. stampa, a stamp); in dim. form, MLG. LG. stempel = OHG. stempfil, MHG. stempfel, G. (after LG.) stempel = Sw. stämpel = Dan. stempel, a stamp; from the verb.] 1. An instrument for crushing, bruising, or pounding; specifically, in metal, that part of the machinery of a stamp-mill which rises and falls, and which delivers the blow by which the ore is reduced to the necessary fineness for being further treated for the separation of the valuable portion; by extension, the mill itself. The stamp consists of head and stem, the latter having upon it the tappet by which, through the agency of the cam or wiper which projects from an axis turned by steam- or water-power, it is raised.

There are 340 stamps in operation at Butte, and the amount of ore treated every day amounts to 500 tons.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 596.

2. An instrument for making impressions on other bodies: an engraved block, die, or the like, by which a mark may be made or delivered by pressure; specifically, a plate upon which is cut the design for the sides or back of a book.

—3. A hand-tool for cutting blanks from paper, leather, etc., in various patterns, according to the shape of the cutting-edges. It operates by pressure or a direct blow, or is laid on the material and struck with a hammer. Hand-stamps are used for canceling, bating, embossing, eyeletting, and similar work.

being perforated to allow the escape of the crushed material as soon as reduced to the required fineness, while a stream of water sweeps the shives away as they are produced. Such a row of stamps is also called a stamp-battery. In another form of stamp-mill the stamp is placed at the end of the piston-rod of a steam-cylinder, on the principle of the steam-hammer. Also called stamping-mill.

2. An oil-mill employing a pestle or pestles to crush seeds and fruits.

stamp-note (stamp'nōt), n. In com., a memorandum delivered by a shipper of goods to the searcher, which, when stamped by him, allows the goods to be sent off by lighter to the ship, and is the captain's authority for receiving them on board. Simmonds.

With silence balm my whirling brain.
M. Arnold, Saint Brandan.

4†. To free; relieve: with of.

Yf two brether be at debate,
Loke nother thou further in hor hate,
But helpe to staunch hom of malice.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 307.

II. intrans. 1. To stop flowing; be stanch'd. [Rare.]

Immediately her issue of blood stanch'd. Luke viii. 44.

2†. To stop; cease.

And the wynde stanch'd and blew no more,
And the meyst trunde into a brygt cloude.
Chron. Vilodun., p. 127. (Hallivell.)

stanch¹, staunch¹ (stānch, stānch), n. [< stanch¹, staunch¹, v.] That which stanches; that which quenches or allays.

O friendship, flour of flowers, O liuely sprite of lyfe, O sacred bond of blissful peace, the stalworth stanch of strife.

Poems of Vncertaine Auctors, On Friendship. (Richardson.)

stanch² (stānch), n. [An assimilated form of stank¹; < OF. estanche, a pool, fish-pond, etc.: see stank¹.] A flood-gate in a river for accumulating a head of water to float boats over shallows; a weir. See stank¹. E. H. Knight.

Formerly rivers used to be penned in by a series of stanches near shoal places, which held up the water and, when several boats were collected in the pool above a stanch, it was suddenly opened, and the sudden rush of water floated the boats over the shallows below.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 573.

stanch³, staunch² (stānch, stānch), a. [*< ME. stanchke, < OF. estanc, fem. estanche, estene, estenke, estain, dried, dry, exhausted, wearied, tired, vanquished, F. étanche, stanch, water-tight, = Pr. estanc, still, unchangeable, = Sp. estanco = Pg. estanque, stanch, water-tight, = It. stanco, tired; from the verb shown under stanch¹, staunch¹. By reason of the fundamental nature of the notion 'stand' and its innumerable phases, and of the phonetic stability of the syllable sta, this root has produced an immense number of derivatives, which are in E. chiefly from the L. source—namely, from the E., stand, n., perstand, etc., understand, withstand, etc.; from Scand., stawi; from the L. (from inf. stare), *stable*¹ (with constable, etc.), *stable*², stablish, establish, stage, stamen, stamin (tamin, etc.), *stay*² (staid, etc.), *cost*², *rest*², contrast, obstacle, obstetric, etc.; (from the pp. status) state, estate, status, station, statist, statue, statute, armistice, interstice, solstice, etc.; constitute, substitute, etc., superstition; (from the ppr. stan(t)-s) stance, stanchion, stanza, circumstance, constant, distant, extant, substantive, etc.; (from sistere, causal of stare) sist, assist, consist, desist, exist, insist, persist, subsist, etc.; while from various derivatives or extensions of the L. √ sta are ult. E. stagnate, stanch, stank¹, tank, stank², stolid, sterile, destine, obstinate, etc.; from the Gr., stasis, static, apostate, ecstasy, metastasis, system, apistle, apostle, etc. To the same ult. √ sta, Teut. or other, may be referred, with more or less plausibility, many E. words having a root or base appar. extended from sta, namely (< √ stap or stap), staff, stave, *stem*¹, *stem*², step, stope, *stoop*³, stamp, stub, stump, stiff, stifle; (< √ stal) *stall*¹, *stale*², *stalt*², *stalk*², *stall*², *stilt*¹, stilt, stool, stout, etc.; (< √ stam) stammer, stumble, *stem*³; (< √ stad) stead, *stud*¹, stead, stithy, stathe, etc.; and see also standard, *stare*¹, *steer*¹, *steer*², *stud*², steel, stow, *store*³, storry, etc. The list, however, is elastic, and may be indefinitely increased or diminished. Standing bevel or beveling. See bevel, 1. Standing block. See block, 11.—Standing bowl. Same as standing cup.

Here, say we drink this standing bowl of wine to him.

Shak., Pericles, ii. 3. 65.

Standing bowsprit, committee, cup, galley, matter. See the nouns.—Standing nut, a cup made of a nut-shell mounted in silver or the like: examples remain dating from the sixteenth century or earlier, made most commonly of coconut-shells.—Standing orders. (a) The permanent orders made by a legislative or deliberative assembly respecting the manner in which its business shall be conducted. (b) In a military organization, those orders which are always in force. Standing panel. See panel.

—Standing part of a tackle, the part of the rope made fast to the strap of a block or any fixed point.—Standing piecet. Same as standing cup. MS. Arundel, 249, f. 89. (Hallwell).—Standing rigging (sant). See rigging.—Standing salt-cellar, shield, etc. See the nouns.—Standing stone, in archæol., a translation of the French pierre levée, a menhir. E. B. Tuckor.

Standing table, a permanent table, fixed in its place, or of such size and solidity that it cannot easily be moved, as the table for meals in the old English hall.

standing-cypress (stan'ding-si'pres), n. A common biennial garden-flower, Gilia coronopifolia (Ipomopsis elegans), native in the southern United States. In its tubular scarlet flowers and finely dissected leaves it resembles the cypress-vine; but it is of an erect wand-like habit.

standing-ground (stan'ding-ground), n. Place or ground on which to stand; especially, that on which one rests, in a figurative sense; a basis of operations or of argument; a fundamental principle. W. Wilson, The State, § 204.

standing-press (stan'ding-pres), n. See press. 1.

standing-room (stan'ding-röm), n. Space sufficient only for standing, as in a theater where all the seats have been taken.

standing-stool (stan'ding-stöl), n. A small frame or machine moving on wheels, used to support a child when learning to walk.

The elf dares peep abroad, the pretty foole

Can wag without a trucking standing-stool.

Fletcher Poems, p. 130. (Hallwell.)

standish (stan'dish), n. [A reduction of stand-*

Standish of Decorated Pottery, 18th century.

(From "L'Art pour Tous")

dish, < stand + dish.] An inkstand; also, a case for writing-materials.

In which agonie tormenting my selfe a long time, I grew by degrees to a milde dis-content; and, pausing a while over my standish, I resolved in verse to paynt forth my passion.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 5.

Here is another letter of Niccolini that has lain in my standish this fortnight.

Walpole, Letters, II. 75.

stand-off (stand'ôf), n. [< stand off: see stand, v.] A holding or keeping off; a counteraction. [Colloq.]

The preferences of other clients, perhaps equal in number and value, who are fighting with Fabian tactics, make a complete stand-off.

The Atlantic, LXVI. 672.

stand-off (stand'ôf), a. [< stand off: see stand, v.] Holding others off; distant; reserved. [Colloq.]

You always talk . . . as if there were no one but Catherine. People generally like the other two much better. Catherine is so stand-off.

Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, i. 2.

stand-offish (stand'ôf'ish), a. [< stand off + -ish.] Same as stand-off. [Colloq.]

If the "landed gentry" were stand-offish, and . . . did not put themselves out of the way to cultivate Miss Shalton's acquaintance, that young lady was all the more grateful for their reserve.

F. W. Robinson, Her Face was her Fortune, v.

stand-offishness (stand'ôf'ish-nes), n. The character of being repellent; the disposition or tendency to hold others at a distance. [Colloq.] stanner (stan' er), n. [Origin obscure.] A small stone; in the plural, gravel. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

stannery¹, a. and n. See stannary.

stannery² (stan'èr-i), a. [ME. stann[e]ry; < stanner + -y.] Gravelly; stony. Palladius. Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 86. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

stannic (stan'ik), a. [= F. stannique; < L. stannum, tin, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to tin; procured from tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a quadrivalent atom: as, stannic acid, $\text{Sn}(\text{OH})_2$, a hydrate obtained from stannous oxide, which unites with bases to form salts called stannates.

stanniferous (sta-nif'è-rus), a. [< L. stannum, tin, + ferre = E. bear.] Containing or affording tin.

stannine (stan'in), n. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ine.] A brittle steel-gray or iron-black ore of tin, of a metallic luster, consisting of the sulphides of tin, copper, and iron, and generally zinc, found in Cornwall; tin pyrites. Also called, from its color, bell-metal ore.

stannite (stan'it), n. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ite.] Same as stannum.

stannous (stan'us), a. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or containing tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a bivalent atom: as, stannous oxide, or protoxide of tin (SnO).

stannum (stan'um), n. [L. stannum, stagnum, tin, also an alloy of silver and lead (> It. stagno = Sp. estagno = Pg. estanho = Pr. estanh = F. étain, tain, tin); perhaps the same as L. stagnum, pool, applied to a mass of fluid metal: see *stank*¹, stagnate. Cf. Bret. stean = Corn. stean = W. ystean = Gael. stain = Manx stainny, tin (< L. ?): see tin.] Tin.

stannyl, n. See stannil.

stant¹, a. A contracted form of standeth, third person singular present indicative of stand.

stant² (stant), n. Same as *stant*¹.

stantion (stan'shon), n. [Appar. a var. of stanchion.] Same as stanchion.

stanza (stan'zä), n. [Formerly also stanzo, stanzi (= Sp. estancia = It. stanza = F. stanee), in def. 2; < It. stanza, Ofr. stantia, prop. an abode, lodging, chamber, dwelling, stance, also a stanza (so called from the stop or pause at the end of it), < ML. stantia, an abode: see stance.] 1. Pl. stanze (-ze). In arch., an apartment or division in a building; a room or chamber: as, the stanze of Raphael in the Vatican.—2. In versification, a series of lines arranged in a fixed order of sequence as regards their length, metrical form, or rimes, and constituting a typical group, or one of a number of similar groups, composing a poem or part of a poem. Stanza is often used interchangeably with strophe—strophe, however, being used preferably of ancient or quantitative, and stanza of modern or accentual and rhymed poetry. In the latter the stanza often consists of lines identical in form throughout, the arrangement of rimes alone defining the group of lines. Such a stanza is not properly a strophe. A couplet is not regarded as a stanza, and a triplet is rarely so designated. Compare couplet. Abbreviated st.

Horace . . . confines himself strictly to one sort of verse, or stanza, in every Ode. Dryden, Misc., Pref.

stanzaed (stan'zad), a. [< stanza + -ed.] Having stanzas; consisting of stanzas: as, a two-stanzaed poem.

stanzaic (stan-zä'ik), a. [< stanza + -ic.] Consisting of or relating to stanzas; arranged as a stanza. E. C. Stedman, Viet. Poets, p. 381.

stanzaic (stan'zik), a. [< stanza + -ic.] Same as stanzaic. E. Wadham, Eng. Versification, p. 92.

stanzo (stan'zō), n. An obsolete form of stanza. Shak., As you like it, ii. 5. 18.

stapel, a. See stapen.

stapedial (stā-pē'di-äl), a. [< NL. stapedius + -äl.] 1. Stirrup-shaped: as, the stapedial bone of the ear.—2. Pertaining to the stapes or its representative, whatever its form.—Stapedial ligament, the annular ligament of the stapes, connecting the foot or base of the stirrup with the margin of the fenestra ovalis.—Stapedial muscle, the stapedius.—Stapedial nerve, a tympanic branch of the facial which innervates the stapedial muscle.

Stapedifera (stap-ē-dif'è-rä), n. pl. [NL. (Thacher, 1877), neut. pl. of stapedifer: see stapediferous.] Those animals which have a stapes, as mammals, birds, reptiles, and amphibians; all vertebrates above fishes.

stapediferous (stap-ē-dif'è-rus), a. [< NL. stapedifer, < ML. stapes, a stirrup, + L. ferre =

E. bear.] Having a stapes; of or pertaining to the Stapedifera.

stapedius (stā-pē'di-us), n.; pl. stapedii (-i). [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup; see stapes.] The stapedial muscle; a muscle of the tympanum actuating the stapes of some animals. In man the stapedius arises from a cavity hollowed out in the pyramid of the petrosal bone; its tendon passes out of a little hole in the apex of the pyramid, and is inserted into the neck of the stapes. Its action draws the head of the stapes backward, and also causes the stapes to rotate a little on a vertical axis drawn through its own center. The name is correlated with incudius and malleolus. See cut under ligoid.

Stapelia (stā-pē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after J. B. van Stapel, a Dutch physician and botanist (died 1636).] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ, type of the tribe Stapeliæ. It is characterized by flowers with a wheel-shaped or reflexed corolla without appendages between the five valvate lobes, and with the tube short and broadly bell-shaped or almost wanting, and by a double corona, the outer of five horizontally spreading lobes alternate with the anthers, the inner of five scales produced into erect or arching horns. There are over 70 species, natives of South Africa. Their short fleshy leafless stems are produced into four prominent angles, which are coarsely toothed, sometimes bearing transient rudiments of leaves at the apex of the new growths. Numerous dark tubercles give the stems a grotesque appearance. Some are cultivated under glass for their beautiful and varied flowers, which are commonly very large, some reaching 12 inches (S. pinnata sometimes 14 inches) in diameter, of singular structure and often exquisitely marbled or dotted. In other species they are dingy or unattractive, usually coarse, thick, fleshy, and short lived, and in most species exhale transiently a fetid odor of carrion, attracting flies, which deposit their eggs upon them in large quantities. Their colors are largely the livid-purple and lurid-reddish, yellow, and brownish hues which are associated with disagreeable odors also in Ardisia, Arctostaphylos, Amorpha, and others of the Loganiaceæ. They are some-times called corpse-flowers; S. bufonia is known, from its blotches, as toad-flower; and S. Aschmannii, from its spreading narrow parted corolla, as stapish flower.

Stapeliæ (stap-ē-lī'è-è), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Stapelia + -æ.] A tribe of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ. It is characterized by valvate and commonly fleshy corolla-lobes, waxy erect or laterally placed pollen-masses solitary in each anther-cell, and obtuse or retuse unappendaged anthers, closely incumbent over the disk of the stigma or partly immersed in it. The 16 genera are plants commonly with short, thick, fleshy stems, coarsely angled or tubercled, without leaves except in the East Indian genus Frerea; one genus, Boucaeria, extends into Europe in Spain and Sicily; the others, as Stapelia, the type, are mostly South African.

stapes (stā'pēz), n. [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup, < OHG. stapf, staph = D. stap, etc., a step; see step, and cf. staffier.] In zool. and anat., the inmost one of the three auditory ossicles of man and other mammals, situated in the tympanum, or middle ear. The stapes is connected on the one hand with the incus, and on the other with the fenestra ovalis, and is moved by a small muscle called the stapedius. The name is derived from the close resemblance in shape of the human stapes to a stirrup.

In man the bone presents a head, with a little fossa for movable articulation with the orbicular incudal bone; a neck or constricted part; two branches, legs or crura; and an oval base or foot. This bone is morphologically one of the proximal elements of the hyoidean arch. The corresponding element in birds and reptiles is very differently shaped, and is sometimes called stapes, often columella. It is rod-like or columellar, with an expanded base fitting the fenestra ovalis, the other end usually showing a cross-bar. Parts of such a stapes are distinguished as mediostapedial, the main shaft; extrastapedial, the part beyond the cross-bar; infrastapedial, the lower arm of the cross-bar; and suprastapedial, the upper arm of the cross-bar—the last being supposed to represent the incus of mammals. Some of these parts may be wanting, or only represented by a ligament, or coalesced with a part of the mandibular arch. The stapes or columella furnishes the primitive actual or virtual connection of the hyoidean arch with the petriotic capsule. See stapedial, columella, 3 (b), and cut under ligoid, Pythondæ, and lyngbyæ.—Annular ligament of the stapes. See ligament and stapedial.

Staphisagria (staf-i-sag'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Tragus, 1546), < ML. staphisagria, staphysagria, stafisagria, etc.; prop. two words, staphis agria, < Gr. as if σταφίς ἀγρία; σταφίς, a dried grape, a raisin, also (in L. staphis) the plant stavesacre; ἀγρία, fem. of ἀγρός, wild, < ἀγρός, a field, the country. The E. form of the name is stavesacre, q. v.] A former genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Ranunculaceæ. It is now classed as a section of the genus Delphinium, and as such distinguished by a short spur, from three to five ovaries forming bladderly few-seeded capsules, and biennial habit. See Delphinium and stavesacre, also ointment of stavesacre (under ointment).

staphisagrine (staf-i-sag'rin), n. [< Staphisagria + -ine.] A poisonous amorphous alkaloid, soluble in ether and in water, obtained from Delphinium Staphisagria, or stavesacre.

staphyle (staf'ile), n. [NL., < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula when swollen.] The uvula.

Staphylea (staf-i-lē'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), abridged from Staphylocodendron (Tournefort, 1700), < L. staphylocodendron, a shrub thought to have been S. pinnata; prob. so named from its clustered fruit, < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, + κόδων, a tree.] A genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Staphyleaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary which is two- or three-parted to the base, contains numerous biseriate ovules, and ripens into an inflated and bladderly membranous capsule, discharging its few seeds at the apex of the two or three lobes. There are 4 species, natives of Europe, the Himalayas, Japan, and North America. They are shrubs with numerous roundish branches, bearing opposite stipulate leaves, each composed of from three to five leaflets, which are involute in the bud and are furnished with stipels. The white flowers, with five erect petals, hang from nodding panicles or racemes. The large and peculiar fruit is the source of the common name bladder-nut. (See cut under uclaria.) S. pinnata, also called bag-nut, common in hedgerows and thickets in Europe, bears hard smooth nuts sometimes used for rosaries.

Staphyleaceæ (staf-i-lē'a'sē-e), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), < Staphylea + -aceæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the cohort Sapindales, long classed as a suborder of the Sapindaceæ, from which it is distinguished by its regular bisexual flowers with the five stamens inserted outside of the base of the disk, by albuminous and sometimes arillate seeds with a straight embryo, and by opposite simple or compound leaves. It includes 16 species, of 4 genera, of which Staphylea is the type; of the others, Turpinia includes a number of small trees and shrubs with roundish berry-like fruit, mostly of tropical Asia and America, and Euscaphis a few Japanese shrubs bearing coriaceous foli- cles. See cut under bladder-nut.

staphyline (staf'i-lin), a. [< Gr. σταφύλιος, of or pertaining to a bunch of grapes, < σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula.] 1. Having the form of a bunch of grapes; botryoidal.—2. Pertaining to the uvula or to the entire palate.—Staphyline glands, palatine glands.

staphylinid (staf-i-lin'id), n. and a. I. n. A rove-beetle, as a member of the Staphylinidæ.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the family Staphylinidæ; staphylinine.

Staphylinidæ (staf-i-lin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Staphylinus + -idæ.] A large and important family of brachelytrous clavicorn beetles, commonly called rove-beetles. They resemble the Pselaphidæ in having short elytra, but differ in having the abdomen flexible and consisting of eight ventral segments. The antennæ are generally eleven-jointed, the labial palpi three-jointed, and the maxillary four-jointed. The short truncate elytra usually leave most of the abdomen exposed, and this, when the beetles are disturbed, is turned up over the back, as if the insects were about to sting. A familiar example is the Oecyptus olens, known as the cocktail and devil's coach-horse. (See Goerius, and cut under devil.) Some species discharge an odoriferous fluid from the tip of the abdomen. The larvae resemble the adults, and are found under bark, in fungi, decaying plants, and the excrement of animals, in ants' nests, hornets' nests, and the nests of certain birds. It is one of the largest and most wide-spread of the families of Coleoptera. About 1,000 species are known in America north of Mexico, and about 5,000 in the whole world. Also Staphylinidæ, Staphylini, Staphylinæ, Staphyliniida, Staphylini, Staphylinites. See cut under Homalium and rove-beetle.

staphyliniform (staf-i-lin'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. Staphylinus, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Resembling a rove-beetle; related to the Staphylinidæ.

staphylinine (staf-i-lin'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Staphylinidæ.

tion of the fixed stars. See acceleration.—Double star. See multiple star.—Equestrian star. See Hippocentaurus.—Evening star. See evening star.—Falling star. See falling star.—Fixed star, a self-luminous body at so vast a distance from the earth as to appear a point of light, almost motionless except for the diurnal revolution of the heavens. To the naked eye the brighter stars appear to have radiating lines of light; but these are due to imperfections of vision, and are different for different observers. All the fixed stars twinkle (see twinkling). In a good telescope on a fine night a star shows a minute round disk surrounded by concentric rings; but these phenomena are mere effects of diffraction, and no instrument yet constructed can enable the eye to detect a fixed star's real breadth. The stars differ in brilliancy, and in this respect are said to have different magnitudes (see magnitude, 5). These in many cases are changeable (see variable star). The number of stars in the whole heavens brighter than a given magnitude m may be approximately calculated by the formula $(3.3)^{1.08+m}$. The stars are very irregularly distributed in the heavens, being greatly concentrated toward the Milky Way. This is particularly true of first-magnitude stars, and again of faint telescopic stars. There are many clusters of stars, among which the Pleiades, the Hyades, Praesepe, Coma Berenices, and the cluster in the sword-handle of Perseus are visible to the naked eye. Other stars are associated in systems of two, three, or more. (See multiple star.) To most eyes the stars appear yellow, but some are relatively pale, others chromatic yellow, and still others ruddy. There are many ruddy stars in the part of the Galaxy near Lyra. L. M. Rutherford of New York first showed that in reference to their spectral lines the fixed stars fall under several distinct types. Type I, according to the usual nomenclature, embraces spectra showing strong hydrogen-lines, all others being very faint. These belong without exception to pale stars, such as Sirius, Vega, Procyon, Altair, Spica, Fomalhaut, Regulus, Castor. Type II embraces spectra showing many strong metallic lines, like the sun. Almost all such stars are chrome, as Arcturus, Capella, Aldebaran, Pollux; but a few are pale, as Deneb and Elward, and a few ruddy. Type III consists of banded spectra, the bands shading away toward the red. These stars are all ruddy, and probably all variable. They embrace Betelgeuze, Antares, Mira Ceti, Sheat, Menkar, Pishpai, Rasalgethi. Type IV consists of spectra having three broad bands shaded away toward the blue end. These all belong to very ruddy stars, of which none are bright, and none seem to be variable. Type V consists of spectra showing bright lines. Such stars are few; their magnitudes and colors are variable. Upon careful comparison of the spectra of stars with those of the chemical elements they contain, it is found that the lines are shifted a little along the spectrum toward one end or the other, according as the star is receding from or approaching the earth. The apparent places of the fixed stars are affected in recognized ways by diurnal motion, precession, nutation, aberration, and refraction. In addition, each star has a very slow motion of its own, called its proper motion. There are very few cases in which this is so great as to have carried the star over the breadth of the moon's disk since the beginning of the Christian era. Many stars in one neighborhood of the heavens show, in many cases, like proper motions—a phenomenon first remarked by R. A. Proctor, and termed by him star-drift. But the average proper motion of the stars is away from a radiant under the left hand of Hercules, showing that the solar system has a relative motion toward that point. This is sufficient to carry a sixth-magnitude star $4\frac{1}{4}$ in a century. The parallax (that is to say, the amount by which the angle at the earth between the star and the sun falls short of 90° when the angle at the sun between the star and the earth is equal to 90°) has been measured only for a few stars, and these few have been selected with a view of finding the largest parallaxes. That of a Centauri, which is the largest, is nearly a second of arc. It is so difficult to measure parallax otherwise than relatively, and to free its absolute amount from variations of latitude, diurnal nutation, refraction, etc., that very little can be said to be known of the smaller parallaxes. It appears, however, that small stars have nearly as great parallaxes as bright ones where the proper motions are not large. The various methods of ascertaining the distances of the stars depend upon three independent principles. The first method is from the parallax, by means of which the distance of the star is calculated by trigonometry. The second method depends on the ascertaining of the speed at which the star is really moving by the shifting of the spectral lines, and then observing its angular motion. In the case of a double star, its motion in the line of sight at elongation can be measured with the spectroscopic; and from this, its orbit being known, its rate of motion at conjunction can be deduced. The third method supposes the ratio of the amount of light emitted by the star to that emitted by the sun to be known in some way, whereupon the ratio of apparent light will show the relative distances. All these methods show that even the nearest stars are hundreds of thousands of times as remote as the sun. In order to reach more exact results it may be necessary to combine two methods so as to determine and eliminate the constant of space, or the amount by which the sum of the angles of a triangle of unit area differs from two right angles. For the present, no decisive result has been reached. The distances of stars having been ascertained, the weights of double stars may be deduced from their elongations and periods. These weights seem to be of the same order of magnitude as that of the sun, not enormously greater or smaller.—French stars, three asterisks arranged in this form * * * used as a mark of distinction between different articles in print.—Gloaming, golden, informed, lunar, Medicanean star. See the adjectives.—Lone Star State, the State of Texas.—Meridian altitude of a star. See altitude.—Morning star, a planet, as Jupiter or Venus, when it rises after midnight. Compare evening star.—Multiple star, a group of two to six fixed stars within a circle of $15'$ radius; in a few cases, however, stars distant a minute or more from one another are considered to form a double star. Thus, ϵ and δ Lyrae, distant from one another upward of $3'$, and separable by the naked eye, each of these consisting of two components distant about $3\frac{1}{2}'$ from one another, with some other stars between them, are sometimes called collectively a multiple star. The multiple stars are distinguished as double (tr. of Gr. $\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\rho\delta\epsilon\lambda\alpha\upsilon\sigma$), triple, quadruple, quintuple, and sextuple. Many of the double stars are merely the one in range of the other, without having any physical connection, and these are called optical doubles. The components of other double stars revolve the one round the other, apparently under the influence of gravitation, forming systems known as binary stars. The orbits of about forty of these are known. Thus, the two stars of a Centauri, distant from one another by $17\frac{1}{2}'$, revolve in about 80 years. In many cases the two components of a double star have complementary colors.—Nebulous star. See nebula.—North star, the north polar star. These stars are of five classes. Class I comprises the "new" or temporary stars, about a dozen in number, which have suddenly appeared very bright, in several cases far outshining Sirius, and after a few months have faded almost entirely away. All these stars have appeared upon the borders of the following semicircle of the Milky Way. They show bright lines in their spectra, indicating incandescent hydrogen. Such was the star which appeared 133 B. C. in Scorpio, and led Hipparchus to the study of astronomy, thus inaugurating sound physical science; others appeared in 1572, 1604, and 1866. Class II embraces stars which go through a cycle of changes, more or less regular, in from four to eighteen months, most of them being at least a hundred times as bright at their maxima as at their minima. These stars are for the most part ruddy. Class III embraces irregularly variable stars, without any definite periods, and commonly undergoing very moderate changes. Class IV embraces stars which in a few days, or a month at most, go through changes of one or two magnitudes, sometimes with two maxima and two minima. Class V embraces stars which remain of constant brightness for some time, and then almost suddenly, at regular intervals, are nearly extinguished, afterward as quickly regaining their former brilliancy.

star¹ (stär), v.; pret. and pp. starred, ppr. starring. [star¹, n.] I. trans. 1. (a) To set with stars, literally or figuratively.

Budding, blown, or odour-faded blooms,
Which star the winds with points of coloured light.
Shelley, Prometheus Unbound, iii. 3.

Fresh green turf, starred with dandelions.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 231.

Hence—(b) To set with small bright bodies, as gems, spangles, or the like. (c) To set with figures of stars forming a sowing or sprinkle. —2. To transform into a star or stars; set in a constellation. [Rare.]

Or that starry'd Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The Sea-Nymphs, and their powers offended.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 19.

3. To affix a star or asterisk to (a written or printed word) for a distinctive purpose, especially, in a list, to distinguish the name of a deceased person. [Colloq.]—4. To crack so as to produce a group of radiating lines.—To star a glaze, to cut out a pane of glass. Tufts, Glossary, 1798. [Thieves' jargon.]

II. intrans. 1. To shine as a star; be brilliant or prominent; shine above others; specifically (theat.), to appear as a star actor.

Dorsett . . . had been playing for a week [1699] at the above (Lincoln's Inn Fields) theatre for the sum of £30. This is the first instance I know of the starring system.
Doran, Annals of the Stage, I, 186.

2. In the game of pool, to buy an additional life or lives. Encyc. Brit., III, 677. [Eng.]—To star it (theat.), to appear as a star, especially in a provincial tour.

star² (stär), n. [Also starr; Heb. (Chal.) shetar, shitar, a writing, deed, or contract. < shatar, cut in, grave, write.] An ancient name for all deeds, releases, or obligations of the Jews, and also for a schedule or inventory. See star-chamber. Also spelled starr.

star-animal (stär'an'i-mäl), n. A radiate, especially a starfish.

star-anise (stär'an is), n. 1. The aromatic fruit of a Chinese shrub or small tree long supposed to be the Illicium anisatum of Linnaeus, but recently determined to be a distinct species, I. verum (named by J. D. Hooker). The fruit is a stellate capsule of commonly eight carpels, each of which contains a single brown shining seed. The seeds contain four per cent. of a volatile oil with the odor and flavor of aniseed, or rather of fennel. Star-anise is used in China as a condiment and spice, and in continental Europe to flavor liquors. Also Chinese anise. 2. The tree which yields star-anise.—Star-anise oil, the aromatic essential oil of star-anise seed. The commercial anise-oil is chiefly obtained from the star-anise.

Star-apple. Chrysophyllum cainito.
a, the fruit, transverse section.

star-apple (stär'ap'l), n.

The fruit of the West Indian Chrysophyllum cainito, or the tree which produces it. The fruit is edible and pleasant, of the size of an apple, a berry in structure, having ten or eight cells, which, when cut across before maturity, give the figure of a star. Also called cañito.

starbeam (stär'bēm), n. A ray of light emitted by a star. Watts, Two Happy Rivals. [Rare.]

star-bearer (stär'bär'ēr), n. Same as Bethlehemite, 3 (a).

star-blasting (stär'bläs'ting), n. The pernicious influence of the stars. Shak., Lear, iii, 4, 60.

starblind (stär'blind), a. [*ME. starblind, < AS. stærblind (= OFries. starblind, stareblind, starblind = MD. D. sterblind = MLG. starblind = OHG. starablint, MHG. starblint, G. starblind = *Icel. starblindr (in starblinda, blindness) = Sw. stærblind = Dan. starblind, stærblind), < stær (= MD. str = MLG. star = OHG. stara, MHG. stare, star, G. staar = Sw. starr = Dan. stær), cataract of the eyes, + blind, blind: see stare and blind.] Seeing obscurely, as from cataract; purblind; blinking.

starboard (stär'börd or -bërd), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also starboard, sterboard; < ME. sterboarde, sterburde, < AS. steorbord (= MD. sterboord, stuyboord, D. stuurboord = MHG. stürbort, G. steuerbord = Icel. stjöruborthi = Sw. Dan. styrbord), < steór, a rudder, paddle, + bord, side: see steer, n., and board, n. Hence (< Teut.) OF. estribord, stribord, F. tribord = Sp. estribord, estribor = Pg. estibordo = It. stribordo, starboard.] I. n. Naut., that side of a vessel which is on the right when one faces the bow: opposed to port (larboard). See *port*⁴.

He took his voyage directly North along the coast, hailing upon his sterboard always the desert land, and upon the leereboard the maine Ocean. Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 4.

II. a. Naut., pertaining to the right-hand side, or being or lying on the right side, of a vessel. starboard (stär'börd or -bërd), v. t. [starboard, n.] To turn or put to the right or starboard side of a vessel: as, to starboard the helm (when it is desired to have the vessel's head go to port).

starboard (stär'börd or -bërd), adv. [starboard, a.] Toward the right-hand or starboard side. Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Trophies.

starbowliness (stär'bō'linz), n. pl. Naut., the men of the starboard watch.

starbright (stär'brīt), a. Brilliant; bright as a star. Emerson, The Day's Ration.

star-bush (stär'būsh), n. A middle-sized South African evergreen, Grewia occidentalis.

star-buzzard (stär'buz'ärd), n. An American buteonine hawk of the genus Asturina, having a system of coloration similar to that of the goshawks or star-hawks, but the form and proportions of the buzzards. The star-buzzards are a small group of handsome hawks peculiar to America. The gray star-buzzard, Asturina plagiata, is found in the United States.

Gray Star-buzzard (Asturina plagiata).

at; hence, to look at with either a bold or a vacant expression.

I will stare him out of his wits.

Shak., M. W. of W., li. 2. 291.

To stare one in the face, figuratively, to be before one's eyes, or undeniably evident to one.

They stare you still in the face.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

stare¹ (stâr), n. [< stare, r.] The act of one who stares; a fixed look with eyes wide open, usually suggesting amazement, vacancy, or insolence.

stare² (stâr), n. [< (a) ME. stare, ster, < AS. star = OHG. stara, MHG. star, G. star, staar, stahr = Icel. starr, stari = Sw. stari = Dan. stâr; (b) also AS. stearn = G. dial. starn, starn, storn = L. starnus (> Lt. storno, storo), dim. starnellus (> OF. estornel, F. estornel), starninus (> Sp. estornino = Pg. estorninho), starning (> Gr. yap, NGr. yapori, yaportan, starning.)] A staring.

The stare (var. starning) that the counsel can bewyre.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowles, l. 348.

And, as a falcon frays

A flock of stares or caddesses, such fear brought his assays Amongst the Trojans and their friends.

Chapman, Iliad, xvi. 541.

stare⁴ (stâr), n. [Formerly also starr; origin obscure.] The marram or matweed, Ammophila arundinacea: same as halm, 3; also applied to species of Carex. [Prov. Eng.]

stareblind, a. See stareblind.

staree (stâr-ê'), n. [*< stare*¹ + -ee.] One who is stared at. [Rare.]

I as starrer, and she as staree.

Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, iii. (Davies.)

starer (stâr-êr), n. [*< stare*¹ + -er.] One who stares or gazes. Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 256.

starfi. An obsolete preterit of stare.

star-facet (stâr-fas-et), n. One of the small triangular facets, eight in number, surrounding the table on a brilliant-cut stone. See brilliant.

starfinch (stâr-finch), n. The redstart, Ruticilla phœnicea. See first cut under redstart.

starfish (stâr-fish), n. 1. An echinoderm with five or more arms radiating from a central disk: applied to all the members of the Asteroidea and Ophiuroidea (see these words). These belong to the phylum Echinodermata, which contains also the sea-urchins, holothurians, crinoids, etc., though these are not usually called starfishes. In some of the asteroids or starfishes proper the disk is enlarged so as to take in nearly or quite the whole length of the rays, so that the resulting figure is a pentagon, or even a circle; but in such cases the stellate structure is evident on examination. Such are known as cushion-stars. In the ophiurians the reverse extreme occurs, the body being reduced to a small circular central disk, with extremely long slender rays, which in some are the euryaleans, are branched into several thousand ramifications. (See cut under basket-fish.) The commonest type of starfish has five rays; whence such are popularly known as five-fingered jack or five-fingers. (See cuts under Asterias and Echinaster.) Those with more than five rays are often called sun-starfish or sun-stars. (See Heliaster, and cuts under Brisinga and Solaster.) The skin of starfishes is tough and leathery, and usually indurated with calcareous plates, tubercles, spines, etc. It is so brittle that starfishes readily break to pieces, sometimes shivering like glass into many fragments. This fragility is at an extreme in the ophiurians, sometimes, on this account, called brittle-stars. (See cut under Astrophyton.) Lost arms are readily replaced by a new growth, if the body of the starfish is not broken. On the under side of the animal's rays may be observed rows of small holes; these are the ambulacra, through which protrude many small soft, fleshy processes—the pedicels, tube-feet, or ambulacral feet—by means of which the creatures crawl about. The ambulacra converge to a central point on the under side, where is the oral opening or mouth. The animals are extremely voracious, and do great damage to oyster-beds. They abound in all seas at various depths, and some of them are familiar objects on every sea-coast. Some of the free crinoids of stellate figure are included under the name starfishes, though they are usually called lily-stars or feather-stars. Encrinurids are fossil starfishes of this kind. (See cuts under Comatulidæ and encrinurite.) Very different as are the appearances superficially presented by a starfish, a sea-urchin, a holothurian, and a crinoid, their fundamental unity of structure may be easily shown. If, for instance, a common five-fingered jack should have its arms bent up over its back till they came to a center opposite the mouth, and then soldered together in that position by plates filling the spaces between the arms, it would make the globular or oblate spheroid figure of a sea urchin. If a starfish should turn over on its back, and have a stem grow from the center, and then have its arms come together like the petals of a lily, it would represent a crinoid. If, again, the starfish should have its arms reduced to mere rudiments, or to tentacular appendages of an elongated leathery body, it would represent a holothurian, sea-slug, or trepang. These are the principal types of echinoderms—in fact less unlike one another than are the several stages they undergo in development, for which see Asterodactylus, Bipinnaria, Brachiolaria, Echinopodium, and pluteus.

Brittle Starfish, Luidia clathrata.

2. The butter-fish or dollar-fish.—3. In her., a bearing representing a five-pointed star, the rays surrounded by short waving flames or the like, and having a small circle in the center.—Brittle starfish, a brittle-star; any ophiurian.—Cushion starfish, a cushion-star, as Ctenodiscus crispatus.—Serpent-starfish. Same as serpent-star.—Starfish-flower. See Stapelia.

star-flower (stâr-flou-er), n. A plant with bright stellate flowers. (a) Species of Trientalis, especially T. americana, the chickweed-wintergreen. (b) Species of the lilaceous genus Brodiaea, formerly classed as Trilecia, of which B. uniflora, a delicately colored free-blooming early flower from Brazil, is the spring star-flower. (c) Species of Sternbergia. (d) Any one of a few other plants.

star-fort (stâr-fört), n. Same as *star*¹, 8.

star-fruit (stâr-fröt), n. A smooth tufted water-plant, Damasonium stellatum, of southern Europe and eastern Asia: so called from the long-pointed radiating carpels. Another name is thruemwort.

star-gage (stâr-gaj), n. See under *gaje*².

star-gaze (stâr-gâz), v. i. To gaze at the stars; especially, to make astronomical or astrological observations: used chiefly in the present participle.

Struck dead with ladies' eyes! I could star-gaze For ever thus. Shirley, Maid's Revenge, i. 2.

star-gazer (stâr-gâ-zér), n. 1. One who gazes at the stars; especially, an astrologer, or, humorously, an astronomer.

Let now the astrologers, the stargazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up, and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee. Isa. xlvii. 13.

2. A book-name of fishes of the family Uranoscopidae: so called from the vertical eyes. The Naked Star gazer, Astroscopus guttatus.

name originally designated Uranoscopus europæus. Astroscopus guttatus is a common star-gazer of the United States.

star-gazing (stâr-gâ-zing), a. Given to the observation and study of the stars.

star-gazing (stâr-gâ-zing), n. Attentive observation and study of the stars; astrology or astronomy. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 63.

star-gooseberry (stâr-gôs-ber-i), n. The fruit of a moderate-sized tree, Phyllanthus (Cicca) distichus, native in Java and Madagascar, and cultivated throughout India. It is a globose drupe, three- to five-lobed, acid, and eaten raw, cooked, or pickled.

star-grass (stâr-gräs), n. A name of various grass-like plants with starry flowers, or other radiate feature. Such are species of Aletris, Hypoxis, and Rhynchospora; also Callitriche, more often starwort, so called from its stellate tufts of leaves. See the genus names, and cut under Hypoxis.

star-hawk (stâr-häk), n. A goshawk; a hawk of the genus Astur: so called from the stellate markings of the adult birds. See goshawk, and cut under Astur.

star-head (stâr-hed), n. A plant of the genus Scabiosa, section Asteroccephalus.

star-hyacinth (stâr-hi-a-sinth), n. A species of squill, Scilla amœna, a very early garden-flower with indigo-blue petals and a conspicuous yellowish-green ovary.

stariert, n. [ME., appar. for starrier*, irreg. < sturre, sterre, a star.] An astronomer.

Without any manner of nicite of stariertes imagination.

Testament of Love, iii.

starik (star'ik), n. [< Russ. starikü, the fulmar, lit. 'an old man': so called from its gray head.] An auklet or murrelet; one of several small birds of the family Alcidæ, inhabiting the North Pacific. The name was originally applied to the ancient auk or murrelet, Synthliboramphus antiquus, and thence extended to various related auklets of the genus Simorhynchus and others, as the crested starik, S. cristatellus. See cuts under auklet and Synthliboramphus.

staring (stâr-ing), p. a. 1. Standing out prominently and fixedly, or fixed and wide open, as eyes; gazing fixedly or intently; fixed.

He cast on me a staring lobe, with colour pale as death.
Surrey, Complaint of a Dying Lover.

How gaunt the Creature is—how lean
And sharp his staring bones!

Wordsworth, Peter Bell.

2. Bristling, as hair; standing stiffly or on end; harsh or rough, as pelage.—3. Striking the eye too strongly; conspicuous; glaring; gaudy: as, staring colors.

Starynge or schynyng as gaye thyngys. Rutilans.
Prompt. Parv. v. p. 172.

The staring red was exchanged for a tone of colouring every way pleasing to the eye.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., I. 282.

staringly (stâr-ing-li), adv. In a staring manner; with fixed look. Imp. Dict.

stark¹ (stärk), a. [*< ME. stark, starc, sterk, sterc, stearc, < AS. stearc, strong, stiff, = OS. stark = OFries. sterk, sterik = D. sterk = MLG. stark, sterk, LG. sterk = OHG. starc, starch, MHG. starc, G. stark = Icel. sterk = Sw. stark = Dan. stærk, strong, orig. stiff, rigid; cf. starling¹ (stär'ling), n. [< ME. starling, sterling, starynge; < starre (< AS. star), a stare, starling (see stare²), + -ling.] 1. An oscine passerine bird, of the family Sturnidae and genus Sturnus, as S. vulgaris of Europe. The common starling or stare is one of the best-known of British birds. It is 8½ inches long when adult; black, of metallic luster, iridescent dark-green on some parts, and steel-blue, purplish, or violet on others, and variegated nearly throughout with pale-buff or whitish tips of the feathers. The wings and tail are duller-black, the exposed parts of the feathers frosted or silvered, with velvety-black and buff edgings. The bill is yellowish, and the feet are reddish. Immature, winter, and female birds are less lustrous, and more variegated with the ochery- or tawny-brown, and have the bill dark-colored. Starlings live much about buildings, and nest in holes of walls, crannies of rock, openings in hollow trees, etc. They are sociable and gregarious, sometimes going in large flocks. They are often caged, readily tamed, and may be taught to whistle tunes, and even to articulate words. The name starling is extended to all birds of the family Sturnidae, and some others of the sturnoid series; also, erroneously, to the American birds of the family Icteridae, sometimes known collectively as American starlings. The last belong to a different series, having only nine primaries, etc. The bird with which the name is specially connected in this sense is Agelaius phoeniceus, the common marsh-blackbird, often called red-winged starling. The name of meadow-starling is often applied to Sturnella magna. See also cuts under Starling and meadow-lark.

Looking up, I saw . . . a starling hung in a little cage. "I can't get out," I can't get out," said the starling.

Sterne, sentimental Journey (The Passport).

2. One of a breed of domestic pigeons which in color resemble the starling.—3. Same as rock-branch.

2. American starlings. See def. 1. Black starling, a melanistic variety of the common starling.—Cape starling or stare (Latham, 1783), the black and white Indian starling of Edwards (1751), the contra from Bengal of Albin (1740), Sturnopastor contra; so called as erroneously described from the Cape of Good Hope (as l'etourneau du Cap de Bonne Esperance of Brisson, 1760), but found chiefly in India. It is 9 inches long; the ground-color of the plumage is black, much glossed with greenish and bronze tints and varied with white. The bill and a bare space above the eyes are orange. Chinese starling (claw birds 1744), the so-called crested grackle (Latham, 1783), Acridotheres cristatellus of central and southern China, and also the Philippine island Luzon (where it is supposed to have been introduced). It is 10½ inches long; the bill is yellow with rose-colored base; the feet and eyes are orange; the plumage is glossy-black with various sheen, and also varied with white; and the head is crested.—Cockscomb-starling or -stare (Latham, 1783), a remarkable African and Arabian starling, Dilophus carunculatus, having in the adult male the head mostly bare, with two erect caruncles or combs on the crown, and a pendent wattle on each side of the face; the plumage is chiefly isabelline gray, with black wings and tail, the former varied with white.—Glossy starlings, various birds, chiefly African, forming a subfamily Lamprocorinthinae (or Judivinae) of the family

Glossy Starling (Spreo bicolor).

Sturnidae, as of the genera Lamprocorinthinae, Lamprocolinus, Spreo (or Notagae). Of the last-named there are several species, as S. bicolor of South Africa and S. pulchra of West Africa. They are mainly of extremely iridescent plumage.—Meadow-starling. See def. 1.—Red-winged starling. See def. 1.—Rose or rose-colored starling, a bird of the genus Pastor, as P. roseus, which used to be called rose or carnation ouzel, rose-colored thrush, etc. See cut under pastor.—Silk starling (Brown, 1776), or stare (Latham, 1783), the Chinese Polioptila sericeus, 8 inches long, the bill bright-red tipped with white, the feet orange, the eyes black, the plumage ashy-gray varied with black, white, green, brown, purplish, etc.—Talking starling, one of several different sturnoid birds of India, etc.; a religious grackle; a mina. See *mina*², Acridotheres, and cut under Eulabes.

starling² (stär'ling), n. [Also sterling; cf. Sw. Dan. stôr, a pole, stake, prop; Sw. störa, prop up with sticks or poles, = Dan. støre, put corn on poles to dry.] 1. In hydraulic, engin., an inclosure like a coffer-dam, formed of piles driven closely together, before any work or structure as a protection against the wash of the waves. state (stāt), n. [< state + -ment.] 1. The act of stating, reciting, or presenting verbally or on paper. — 2. That which is stated; a formal embodiment in language of facts or opinions; a narrative; a recital; the expression of a fact or of an opinion; an account; report; as, a verbal statement; a written statement; a bank statement; a doctrinal statement. — Calculus of equivalent statements. See calculus. state-monger (stāt'mung'gēr), n. One who is versed in politics, or dabbles in state affairs. Imp. Dict. stater¹ (stā'tēr), n. [< state + -er]. One who states. stater² (stā'tēr), n. [< L. stater, < Gr. στατήρ, a standard of weight or money, a Persian gold coin, also a silver (or sometimes gold) coin of certain Greek states, < ιστάται, mid. and pass. ιστάσθαι, stand.] A general name for the principal or standard coin of various cities and states of ancient Greece. The common signification is a gold coin equal in weight to two drachmæ of Attic standard, or about 132.6 grains, and in value to twenty drachmæ. There were also in various states stater of Euboea and Æginetan standards. The oldest stater, those of Lydia, said to have been first coined by Croesus, were struck in the pale gold called electrum. At the period of Greek decline the silver tetradrachm was called stater. This coin is the "piece of money" (equivalent to a Jewish shekel) of Mat. xvii. 27. As a general term for a standard of weight, the name stater was given to the Attic mina and the Sicilian litra. state-room (stāt'rōm), n. 1. A room or an apartment of state in a palace or great house. — 2. In the United States navy, an officer's sleeping-apartment (called cabin in the British navy). — 3. S.] states-general (stāts'jen'g-ral), n. pl. The bodies that constitute the legislature of a country, in contradistinction to the assemblies of provinces; specifically [cap.], the name given to the legislative assemblies of France before the revolution of 1789, and to those of the Netherlands. statesman (stāts'mān), n.; pl. statesmen (-men). [= D. staatsman = G. staatsmann = Sw. statsman = Dan. statsmand; as stāts, poss. of state, + man.] 1. A man who is versed in the art of government, and exhibits conspicuous ability and sagacity in the direction and management of public affairs; a politician in the highest sense of the term. It is a weakness which attends high and low: the statesman who holds the helm, as well as the peasant who holds the plough. South. The Eastern politicians never do anything without the opinion of the astrologers on the fortunate moment. . . . Statesmen of a more judicious prescience look for the fortunate moment too; but they seek it, not in the conjunctions and oppositions of planets, but in the conjunctions and oppositions of men and things. Burke, Letter to a Member of the Nat. Assembly, 1791. 2. One who occupies his own estate; a small landholder. [Prov. Eng.] The old statesmen or peasant proprietors of the valley had for the most part succumbed to various destructive influences, some social, some economical, added to a certain amount of corrosion from within. Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, I. ii. = Syn. 1. See politician. statesmanlike (stāts'mān-lik), a. [< statesman + like.] Having the manner or the wisdom of statesmen; worthy of or befitting a statesman: as, a statesmanlike measure. statesmanly (stāts'mān-li), a. Relating to or befitting a statesman; statesmanlike. Dr. Quincey. statesmanship (stāts'mān-ship), n. [< statesman + -ship.] The qualifications or employments of a statesman; political skill, in the higher sense. The petty craft so often mistaken for statesmanship by minds grown narrow in habits of intrigue, jobbing, and official etiquette. Macaulay, Mill on Government. state-socialism (stāt'sō'shal-izm), n. A scheme of government which favors the enlargement of the functions of the state as the best way to introduce the reforms urged by socialists for the amelioration of the poorer classes, as the nationalization of land, state banks where credit shall be given to laboring men, etc. state-socialist (stāt'sō'shal-ist), n. A believer in the principles of state-socialism; one who favors the introduction of socialistic innovations through the agency of the state. stateswoman (stāts'wūm'an), n.; pl. stateswomen (-wūm'en). [< stāts, poss. of state, + woman.] A woman who is versed in or meddles with public affairs, or who gives evidence of political shrewdness or ability. [Rare.]

rection of a state, and relating to its political interests or government. (b) A newspaper selected by, or pursuant to law, for the publication of official or legal notices.— State prison. (a) A jail for political offenders only. (b) A prison maintained by a State for the regular confinement of felons under sentence to imprisonment; distinguished from county and city jails, in which are confined misdemeanants, and felons awaiting trial, or awaiting execution of the death penalty, and from reformatories, etc. [U. S.]— State prisoner, sword, etc. See the nouns. state (stāt), r. t.; pret. and pp. stated, ppr. stating. [< state, n.] 1. To set; fix; settle; establish; establish: as, to state a day: chiefly used in the past participle. And you bestated in a double hope. B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6. 2. To settle as a possession upon; bestow or settle upon. You boast to me of a great revenue, a large substance, Wherein you would endow and state my daughter. Middleton and Rowley, Fair Quarrel, i. 1. 3. To express the particulars of; set down in detail or in gross; represent fully in words; make known specifically; explain particularly; narrate; recite: as, to state an opinion; to state the particulars of a case. I pretended not fully to state, much less demonstrate, the truth contained in the text. Atterbury. 4. In law, to aver or allege. Thus, stating a case to be within the purview of a statute is simply alleging that it is; while showing it to be so consists in a disclosure of the facts which bring it within the statute.— Account stated. See account.— Case stated. See case agreed, under case.— To state it, to keep state. See state, n. Wolsey began to state it at York as high as ever. Fuller, Ch. Hist., v. ii. 4. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

static (stát'ík), a. [(< Gr. στατικός, causing to stand, pertaining to standing, < στατός, verbal adj. of στάω, mid. and pass. στασθαί, stand; see stasis, stand.] 1. Pertaining to weight and the theory of weight.—2. Same as statural.—Static ataxia, inability to stand without falling or excessive swaying, especially with closed eyes, as in tabes.—Static gangrene, gangrene resulting from mechanical obstruction to the return of blood from a part.—Static refraction. See refraction.

statistical (stát'í-kál), a. [(< static + -al.] 1. Pertaining to bodies at rest or to forces in equilibrium.—2. Acting by mere weight without producing motion: as, static pressure.—Statistical electricity. See electricity.—Statistical induction. See induction, 6.—Statistical manometer. See manometer.

statically (stát'í-kál-i), adv. In a statical manner; according to statics.

Statice (stát'í-sē), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < Gr. στατική, an astringent herb, fem. of στατικός, causing to stand; see static.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Plumbaginæ, type of the tribe Staticeæ. It is characterized by its acaulescent or tufted herbaceous or somewhat shrubby habit, flat alternate leaves, inflorescence commonly cymose and composed of one-sided spikes, stamens but slightly united to the petals, and styles distinct to the angles of the ovary, with capitate, oblong, or linear stigmas. Over 120 species have been described, natives of the sea-shore and of desert sands, mostly of the Old World, and of the northern hemisphere, especially of the Mediterranean region. A smaller number occur in America, South Africa, tropical Asia, and Australia. They are usually perennials; a few are diminutive loosely branched shrubs. They are smooth or covered with scurf or dust. The leaves vary from linear to obovate, and from entire to pinnatifid or dissected; they form a rosette at the root, or are crowded or scattered upon the branches. The short-pedicelled corolla consists of five nearly or quite distinct petals with long claws, and is commonly surrounded by a funnel-shaped calyx which is ten-ribbed below, and scarious, plicate, and colored above, but usually of a different color from the corolla, which is often white with a purple or lavender calyx and purplish-brown pedicel. They are known in general as sea-lavender. The common European S. Limonium is also sometimes called marsh-beet from its purplish root; it is the red behen of the old apothecaries. Its American variety, Caroliniana, the marsh-rosmary of the coast from Newfoundland to Texas, is also known as canker-root, from the use as an astringent of its large bitter fleshy root, which also contains tannic acid (whence its name ink-root). The very large roots of S. latifolia are used for tanning in Russia and Spain, and those of S. mucronata as a nerverine in Morocco under the name of safra. Other species also form valued remedies, as S. Brasiliensis, the guaycura of Brazil and southward. Many species are cultivated for their beauty, as S. latifolia, and S. arborescens, a shrub from the Canaries. In Afghanistan, where several species grow in desert regions, they form a source of fuel.

Staticeæ (stá-tis'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Statice + -æ.] A tribe of plants, of the order Plumbaginæ, distinguished from the other tribe (Plumbagææ) by flowers with a commonly spreading, scarious, and colored calyx-border, stamens united to the petals at the base or higher, and styles distinct to the middle or the base. It includes 5 genera, of which Statice is the type. They are commonly acaulescent plants, very largely maritime, and of the Mediterranean region.

statics (stát'íks), n. [Pl. of static (see -ics). Cf. F. statique, < Gr. στατική, the art of weighing, fem. of στατικός, causing to stand; see static.] That branch of mechanics which treats of the relations of strains and stresses, or of the figures of bodies in equilibrium and of the magnitudes and directions of the pressures.—Chemical, graphical, social statics. See the adjectives.

station (stá'shon), n. [ME. stacion, < OF. station, stacion, estagon, estachon, estaisun, etc., F.

station = Sp. estacion = Pg. estação = It. stazione = D. G. Sw. Dan. station, < L. statio(n)-, a standing, place of standing, station, a post, abode, dwelling, position, office, etc., < stare, stand; see state, stand.] 1. A standing still; a state of rest or inactivity. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Her motion and her station are as one.

Shak., A. and C., iii. 3. 22.

Man's life is a progress, and not a station.

Emerson, Compensation.

2. Manner of standing; attitude; pose: rare except in the specific uses.

An eye like Mars to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 58.

Specifically—(a) In med., the steadiness (freedom from swaying) with which one stands. (b) The manner of standing or the attitude of live stock, particularly of exhibition game fowls: as, a duckwing game-cock of standard high station.

3. The spot or place where anything habitually stands or exists; particularly, the place to which a person is appointed and which he occupies for the performance of some duty; assigned post: as, a life-boat station; an observing-station; the station of a sentinel; the several stations of the officers and crew of a ship when the fire-signal is sounded.

If that service ye now do want,
What station will ye be?

Blanchefleur and Jellyflower (Child's Ballads, IV. 297).

One of our companions took his station as sentinel upon the tomb of the little mosque.

O'Donovan, Merv. xx.

4. The place where the police force of any district is assembled when not on duty; a district or branch police office. See police station, under police.—5. The place where the British officers of a district in India, or the officers of a garrison, reside; also, the aggregate of society in such a place: as, to ask the station to dinner. Yule and Burnell, Anglo-Indian Glossary.

The little bills done by the rich bunneahs, the small and great pecuniary relations between the station and the bazaar.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 194.

6. The condition or position of an animal or a plant in its habitat, or its relation to its environment: often used synonymously with habitat (but habitat is simply the place where an animal or plant lives, station the condition under which it lives there).

The males and females of the same species of butterfly are known in several cases to inhabit different stations, the former commonly basking in the sunshine, the latter haunting gloomy forests.

Darwin, Descent of Man, I. 391.

7. In surv.: (a) The place selected for planting the instrument with which an observation is to be made. (b) A fixed uniform distance (usually the length of a chain of 100 feet, or 66 feet, or half the length of a twenty-meter chain) into which a line of survey is divided. The stations are consecutively numbered.—8. A stock-farm. [Australia.]—9. A regular stopping-place. (a) One of the stages or regular stopping-places at which pilgrims to Rome or other holy place were wont to stop and rest, as a church or the tomb of a martyr. (b) One of the places at which ecclesiastical processions pause for the performance of an act of devotion, as a church, the tomb of a martyr, or some similar sacred spot. Hence—(c) The religious procession to and from or the service of devotion at these places. (d) One of the representations of the successive stages of Christ's passion which are often placed round the naves of churches, and by the sides of the way leading to sacred edifices, and which are visited in rotation. (e) In the early church, the place appointed at church for each class of worshippers, more especially for each grade of penitents; hence, the status, condition, or class so indicated. (f) A place where railway-trains regularly stop for the taking on of passengers or freight; hence, the buildings erected at such a place for railway business; a depot.

10. Eccles.: (a) In the early church, an assembly of the faithful in the church, especially for the celebration of the eucharist. (b) The fast and service on Wednesday and Friday (except between Easter and Pentecost), in memory of the council which condemned Christ, and of his passion. These are still maintained by the Greek Church, but the fast of Wednesday in the Western Church has been abrogated. (c) Among Roman Catholics, a church where indulgences are to be obtained on certain days.—11. Situation; position.

The head has the most beautiful appearance, as well as the highest station, in a human figure.

Addison, Spectator, No. 98.

12. Status; rank; standing; specifically, rank or standing in life; social state or position; condition of life; hence, high rank or standing.

They in France of the best rank and station.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 3. 73.

He never courted men in station.

Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

Content may dwell in all stations.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 27.

Given as a tonic, but not worthy an official station.

Dunghison, Med. Dict.

13. In mining, an enlargement made in a shaft, level, or gangway to receive a pump, bob, tank, or machinery of any kind.—False station, in surv. See false.—Life-saving station, a station on a sea-coast furnished with life-boats and other apparatus for saving life from shipwreck.—Military station, a place where troops are regularly kept in garrison.—Naval station, a safe and commodious shelter or harbor for the warlike or commercial ships of a nation, where there is a dockyard and everything requisite for the repair of ships.—Outside station. See outside.—Syn. 9 (f). See depot.

station (stá'shon), v. t. [(< station, n.] To assign a station or position to: as, to station troops on the right or left of an army; to station a sentinel on a rampart; to station one's self at a door.

Not less one glance he caught Thro' open doors of Ida station'd there Unshaken, clinging to her purple dore.

Tennyson, Princess, v.

stational (stá'shon-al), a. [(< L. stationalis, standing still, fixed, < statio(n)-, a standing still, a post; see station.] Of or pertaining to a station.

stationariness (stá'shon-á-ri-nes), n. Stationary character or quality; fixity: as, the stationariness of the barometer; the stationariness of rents. J. S. Mill, On Liberty, iii.

1. a. 1. Having a particular station or place; remaining in a certain place; not movable, or not intended to be moved; not moving, or appearing not to move; technically, without velocity, whether this condition is only instantaneous, or whether the body spoken of remains motionless for an interval of time. A planet is said to be stationary at a turning-point of its motion, when its longitude is neither increasing nor diminishing. The sun is said to be stationary when it reaches one of the tropics and begins to turn toward the equinoctial.

2. Remaining in the same condition or state; making no progress; without change; with neither increase nor decrease of symptoms, intensity, etc.: as, a stationary temperature.

The ancient philosophy disdained to be useful, and was content to be stationary.

Macaulay, Bacon.

Stationary air, the amount of air which remains constantly in the lungs in ordinary respiration.—Stationary contact, diseases, engine. See the nouns.—Stationary motion, such a motion of a system that no particle continually departs further and further from its original position, nor does its velocity continually increase or diminish. Clausius.—Stationary point, on a curve, a point where the point generating the curve is stationary and turns back; a cusp; a binode whose two tangents coincide.—Stationary tangent of a curve, a tangent where the moving tangent generating the curve is stationary and turns back; an inflection.—Stationary tangent plane of a surface, a tangent plane which has stationary contact with the surface.

II. n.; pl. stationaries (-riz). 1. A person or thing which remains or continues in the same place or condition; specifically, one of a force of permanent or stationary troops.

The stationaries are mine already. So are the soldiery all the way up the Nile.

Kingsley, Hypatia, xx.

Then they are stationaries in their houses, which be in the middle points of the latitudes, which they call eclipses.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, ii. 16.

2. One who wishes to stay as or where he is; one who opposes or resists progress; an extreme conservatist.

Divided between the party of movement and that of resistance—the progressives and the stationaries.

Huc, Travels (trans. 1852), II. 129.

Fuller, Worthies, Essex, I. 519.

status (stā'tus), n. [< L. status, standing, position, attitude, state: see state.] 1. Standing or position as regards rank or condition.—2. Position of affairs.—3. In law, the standing of a person before the law in the class of persons indicated by his or her legal qualities; the relation fixed by law in which a person stands toward others or the state. Different writers vary much in the extent of meaning implied, but in the best usage it includes liberty, citizenship, and marriage, infancy and majority and wardship or tutelage, and mental capacity or incapacity according to legal tests. It is rarely if ever used of any of those relations which are terminable by consent, such as partnership.—Status quo, the condition in which (the thing or things were at first or are now). Compare in statu quo.

statutable (stat'ū-tā-bl), a. [< statute + -able.]

1. Made, required, or imposed by statute; statutory: as, a statutable punishment.—2. Allowed by the rules; standard.

I met with one the other day who was at least three inches above five foot, which you know is the statutable measure of that club.

Addison, Spectator, No. 108.

statutably (stat'ū-tā-bli), adv. In a manner agreeable to statute; as required or provided by statute.

statute (stat'ūt), n. [< ME. statut, < OF. statut, estatut, statu, F. statut = Pr. statut = Sp. Pg. estatuto = It. statuta, statuto = D. statut = G. Sw. Dan. statut, < LL. statutum, a statute, prop. neut. of L. status, pp. of statuere, set up, establish: see stand.] 1. An ordinance or law; specifically, a law promulgated in writing by a legislative body; an enactment by a legislature; in the United States, an act of Congress or of a State or Territorial legislature passed and promulgated according to constitutional requirements; in Great Britain, an act of Parliament made by the Sovereign by and with the advice of the Lords and Commons. Some early statutes are in the form of charters or ordinances, proceeding from the crown, the consent of the Lords and Commons not being expressed. Statutes are either public or private (in the latter case affecting an individual or a company); but the term is usually restricted to public acts of a general and permanent character. Strictly speaking, an ordinance established by either house of the legislature, or by both, without the assent of the executive, as a resolution, or joint resolution, is not a statute. The word has sometimes, however, been interpreted to include municipal ordinances. See also act, article, bill, by-law, charter, code, decree, edict, law, ordinance, petition, provision.

Ac whiles Hunger was her maister there wolde none of hem chydre.

Ne stryue ageines his statut so sterneliche he loked.

Piers Plowman (B), vi. 321.

The statutes of the Lord are right. Ps. xix. 8.

Girded with frumps and curtall gibes, by one who makes sentences by the Statute, as if all above three inches long were confiscat. Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

What are called in England constitutional statutes, such as Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Act of Settlement, the Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland, are merely ordinary laws, which could be repealed by Parliament at any moment in exactly the same way as it can repeal a highway act or lower the duty on tobacco.

J. Bryce, American Commonwealth, I. 237.

2. The act of a corporation or of its founder, intended as a permanent rule or law: as, the statutes of a university.—3. In foreign and civil law, any particular municipal law or usage, though not resting for its authority on judicial decisions or the practice of nations. Burrill; Worcester.—4. A statute-fair. [Prov. Eng.]—

Bloody statute, an occasional name of the Act of the Six Articles. See the Six Articles, under article. Declaratory statute. See declaratory. Directory statute. See directory. Enabling statute, a statute which confers a power upon a person or body that did not previously possess it.—Enlarging statute, a statute which increases a power that already existed.—Equity of a statute. See equity. Estate by statute, more fully estate by statute merchant, or estate by statute staple, in Eng. law, the estate or tenancy which a creditor acquired in the lands of his debtor by their seizure on judgments by confession in forms now obsolete. See statute merchant and statute staple, below.—General statute, a statute which relates directly to the government or the general public interest, or to all the people of the state or of a particular class, condition, or district therein. See legislation, also public statute and local statute.—Local statute. See local legislation, under local.—Mandatory statute. See mandatory.—Penal statutes. See penal.—Private statutes. (a) See private acts, under private. (b) Same as special statute. Public statutes. See public acts, under public.—Remedial statutes, statutes the main object of which appears directly beneficial, by supplying some defect in the law or removing inconveniences, as distinguished from those the immediate aspect of which is to impose punishment or penalty, which are called penal statutes. Some statutes partake of both characters, for a statute which is penal as against an offender may be remedial as toward those whom it is intended to protect.—Retroactive statute. See retroactive.—Special or private statute, a statute which the courts will not notice unless pleaded and proved like any other fact; also, a particular or peculiar statute: as, there is a special statute regulating chattel mortgages on canal-boats.—Statute against benevolences, an English statute of 1483-4 (1 Rich. III., c. 2) abolishing the peculiar system of raising money by solicitation, called benevolences, and declaring that such exactions should not be taken for precedent.—Statute cap. See cap.—Statute de Donis, more fully Statute de Donis Conditionalibus, an English statute of 1285 (13 Edw. I.), being the Statute of Westminster, ii. c. 1) intended to put an end to the common law doctrine that under a gift to a man and the heirs of his body he acquired absolute title by having issue, even though none should survive. The act prescribed instead that the condition stated by the giver of reversion in failure of issue should be carried into effect. Also sometimes called statute of entail.—Statute labor. See labor.—Statute lace. See lace.—Statute law, a law or rule of action prescribed or enacted by the legislative power, and promulgated and recorded in writing; also, collectively, the enactments of a legislative assembly, in contradistinction to common law. See law.—Statute merchant, in law, a bond of record, now obsolete, acknowledged before the chief magistrate of some trading town, on which, if not paid at the day, an execution might be awarded against the body, lands, and goods of the obligor. See pocket-judgment.

A certaine blinde retaylor, called the Diuell, used to lend money vpon pawnes or anie thing, and would let one for a need haue a thousand poundes vpon a statute merchant of his soule.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 9.

Statute of bread and ale. See bread.—Statute of charitable uses, an English statute of 1601 (43 Eliz., c. 4), sometimes called the statute of Elizabeth, for the protection of property devoted to charities. It authorized the lord chancellor to appoint commissioners to inquire into the management of such property, with power to correct abuses.—Statute of Circumspecte Agatis, an English statute of 1285 (13 Edw. I.), in the form of a writ addressed to the judges: so named from its first two words. It directed that the king's prohibition should not lie in spiritual matters, and that the jurisdiction of the spiritual courts should be exercised in cases of demands by a person for tithes, mortuaries, pensions, etc., notwithstanding such prohibition.—Statute of false pretenses, an English statute of 1757 (30 Geo. II., c. 24) which defines and punishes the crime of false pretenses.—Statute of fraudulent conveyances, sometimes called the statute of Elizabeth. (a) An English statute of 1571 (13 Eliz., c. 5), reenacted in nearly all of the United States, which declares all conveyances of property with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors to be void as against such creditors. (b) An English statute of 1585 (27 Eliz., c. 4) making void all conveyances of land made with intent to deceive purchasers.—Statute of Gloucester, an English statute of 1278 (6 Edw. I.), passed at Gloucester, and relating to local franchises and judicature, damages to real property, waste, trespass, etc.—Statute of laborers, an English statute of 1349 (23 Edw. III.) designed to compel workmen and servants to work for the wages commonly paid in the year 1346: enacted because the pestilence had seriously decreased the number of servants, and the survivors demanded exorbitant wages.—Statute of Lincoln, an English statute of 1315-16 (9 Edw. II., st. 2), so called because the Parliament sat at Lincoln. It prescribed the qualifications of sheriffs. Also known as the statute of sheriffs.—Statute of Marlborough (Marleberge, Marlbridge), an English statute of 1267 (2 Hen. III.) so called because made at Marlborough, containing twenty-nine chapters or sections relating principally to distress suits, landlord and tenant, courts, writs, etc. It is one of the earliest written laws, after the Great Charter, and is said to have been intended to defeat attempts to evade feudal dues on succession at death made by gifts inter vivos.—Statute of merchants (also known as the statute of Acton Burnell, from the place of its enactment). (a) An English statute or ordinance of 1283 (11 Edw. I.) for the collection of debts. (b) Another of 1285 (13 Edw. I.) for the same purpose.—Statute of Merton. Same as provisions of Merton (which see, under provision).—Statute of military tenures. See military.—Statute of monopolies. Same as Monopoly Act (which see, under monopoly).—Statute of Northampton, an English statute of 1328 (2 Edw. III.) relating to felonies, sheriffs, etc.—Statute of Quia Emptores, an English statute of 1289, 1290 (18 Edw. I.), which, because purchasers of land had evaded their feudal dues to the chief lord by claiming to hold under the seller as their lord, provided that upon all sales or conveyances of land in fee simple the feeoffee should hold, not of his immediate feoffee, but of the next lord paramount of whom the feoffee himself held, and by the same services, thus putting an end to subinfeudation for several centuries.—Statute of Rageman, an English statute of 1276 (4 Edw. I.) requiring justices to "go throughout the land" to try suits for trespasses.—Statute of Rutland, Ruddlan, or Rothian, an English royal ordinance of 1284 (12 Edw. I.) made at Rutland, which, among other things, forbade suits in the Exchequer except such as concerned the king and his officers, and referred to the keeping of the rolls, etc. Also called provisions made in the Exchequer.—Statute of sheriffs. Same as statute of Lincoln.—Statute of Stamford, an English statute of 1309 (3 Edw. II.) which confirmed an act of 28 Edw. I. abolishing the taking of goods, etc., by the king when on a journey except upon payment, and also abolished certain customs duties.—Statute of Winchester or Winton, an English statute of 1285 (13 Edw. I.) containing police regulations such as concern lesser crimes and the hue and cry, and prohibiting fairs and markets in churchyards.—Statute of York, an English statute of 1318 (12 Edw. II.) which relates to the administration of justice.—Statutes of liveryes, English statutes, the first of which were in 1377 (1 Rich. II., c. 7), 1392-3 (16 Rich. II., c. 4), and 1396-7 (20 Rich. II., cc. 1 and 2), for the better preservation of the peace: so called because directed against the practice of giving distinctive liveries to retainers and partisans, whereby confederacies and hostile parties were engendered.—Statutes of Westminster, early English statutes, so called because made at Westminster. "The first" (1275), comprising fifty-one chapters, relates to freedom of elections, amercements, bail, extortion by officers, aid taken by lords, etc. "The second" (1285), including fifty chapters, relates to gifts, writs, pleas, court-proceedings, etc. Also known as Statute de Donis (which see, above). "The third" was the statute "Quia Emptores" (which see, above).—Statute staple, in law, a bond of record, now obsolete, acknowledged before the mayor of the staple or town constituting a grand mart, by virtue of which the creditor might forthwith have execution against the body, lands, and goods of the debtor on non-payment.

There is not one gentleman amongst twenty but his land be engaged in twenty statutes staple.

Middletown, Family of Love, i. 3.

The Great Statute, an English code of customs law of 1660 (12 Car. II., c. 4.) imposing duties which were termed the "old subsidy." (As to noted statutes on particular subjects, such as statute of distributions, statute of enrolment, statute of fines, statute of frauds, statutes of jeofail, statute of Jevery, statute of limitations, statutes of mortmain, statute of murders, statute of non-claim, statute of premonition, statute of provisors, statute of staple, statute of tillage, statute of uses, statute of wills, see the word characterizing the statute.) = Syn. 1. Enactment, Ordinance, etc. See law.

Medusæ, q. v.*] In Haeckel's classification, a subfamily of Scyphomedusæ, having four pairs of adradial gonads or four simple interradial gonads in the subumbrellar wall, four large perradial gastral pouches, and no special sense-organs.

stauromedusan (stā'rō-mē-dū'san), a. and n. [< Stauromedusæ + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Stauromedusæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Stauromedusæ.

Stauropus (stā'rō-pus), n. [< NL. (Germar, 1813), < Gr. σταυρος, a cross, + πους = E. foot.]

1. A genus of bombycid moths, of the family Notodontidae, having the thorax woolly, the fore wings rather broad and sinuate on the hind margins, hind wings rounded, tongue weak, and the abdomen slightly tufted above. The larvæ have fourteen legs, and are naked, with humps on the middle segments and two short anal projections; the legs on the third and fourth segments are exceedingly long. When at rest they raise the large head and enlarged anal segments, and it is from their extraordinary appearance that the only European species, S. fagi, derives its English name of lobster-moth. Its larva is of a brown color, and feeds on oak, birch, beech, and apple. The only other known species is Asiatic.

2. A genus of melandryid beetles, erected by Latreille and Germar in 1863 on a single South American species.

stauroscope (stā'rō-skōp), n. [< Gr. σταυρός, a cross, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An optical instrument, invented by Von Kobell of Munich, for examining sections of crystals, and determining the position in them of the planes of light-vibration.

Steak of flesh — charbonnade. Palsgrave, p. 275.
 Fair ladies, number five,
 Who, in your merry freaks,
 With little Tom contrive
 To feast on ale and steaks.
Sieft. Five Ladies at Sot's Hole.

2†. A slash or panel in a garment.

Is that your lackey yonder, in the steaks of velvet?
Middleton, Phoenix, I. 5.

Hamburg steak, raw beef, chopped fine, seasoned with onions, etc., formed into a cake, and cooked in a close frying-pan. Porter-house steak. See porter-house. Round steak, a steak from the round. Rump steak. See rump steak. Tenderloin steak. See tenderloin.

steak-crusher (stāk'krush'ēr), n. A kitchen utensil for pounding, rolling, or otherwise crushing a steak before cooking, to make it tender.

steal¹ (stēl), v.: pret. stole, pp. stolen (formerly stole), ppr. stealing. [ME. stelen, steolen (pret. stal, stole, stel, pp. stolen, steolen, stole, -estolen), < AS. stelan (pret. stēl, pl. stēlon, pp. stolen) = OS. stelan = OFries. stela = D. stelen = MLG. lāt, stelen = OHG. stelan, MHG. steln, G. stehlen = Icel. stela = Sw. stjåla = Dan. stjæle = Goth. stilan, steal. Connection with Gr. στερίσκω, στεινέω, deprive of, is doubtful. Hence ult. *stale*¹, stealth. For another word for 'steal,' with L. and Gr. connections, see *lift*³.] 1. trans. To take feloniously; take and carry off clandestinely, and without right or leave; appropriate to one's own uses dishonestly, or without right, permission, or authority: as applied to persons, to kidnap; abduct: as, to steal some one's purse; to steal cattle; to steal a child.

When Grisandol saugh he was on slepe, she and his fellows come as softly as thei myght, and stole away his staffe.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 425.

How then should we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold?
 Gen. xlv. 8.

2. To remove, withdraw, or abstract secretly or stealthily.

And from beneath his Head, at dawning Day,
 With softest Care have stolen my Arm away.
Prior, Solomon, ii.

3†. To smuggle, literally or figuratively.

Pray Wish to steal you in, as I hope he will do.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 187.

All the Spices and drugs that are brought to Mecca are stolen from thence as Contrabanda.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 223.

4. To take or assume without right.

Oh, that deceit should steal such gentle shapes,
 And with a virtuous vizard hide foul guile!
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 2. 27.

5. To obtain surreptitiously, or by stealth or surprise: as, to steal a kiss.

What sought these lovers then, by day, by night,
 But stolen moments of disturb'd delight?
Crabbe, Works, I. 48.

6. To entice or win by insidious arts or secret means.

How many a holy and obsequious tear
 Hath dear religious love stole from mine eye!
Shak., Sonnets, xxxi.
 Thou hast discovered some enchantment old Whose spells have stolen my spirit as I slept.
Shelley, Prometheus Unbound, ii. 1.

7. To perform, procure, or effect in a stealthy or underhand way; perform secretly; conceal the doing, performance, or accomplishment of.

And than lough Arthur, and seide to the kynge Ban that this mariage wolde he haue stole hadde no Merlin i-be.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 363.

I went this evening to visit a friend, with a design to rally him upon a story I had heard of his intending to steal a marriage without the privity of us his intimate friends and acquaintance.
Steele, Spectator, No. 133.

8. To move furtively and slyly: as, she stole her hand into his.

The 'prentice speaks his disrespect by an extended finger, and the porter by stealing out his tongue.
Steele, Spectator, No. 354.

9. In base-ball, to secure, as a base or run, without an error by one's opponents or a base-hit by the batter; to run successfully to, as from one base to the next, in spite of the efforts of one's opponents: as, to steal second base: sometimes used intransitively with to: as, to steal to second base.—10. In netting, to take away (a mesh) by netting into two meshes of the preceding row at once. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 359.—To steal a by. See byl.—To steal a march, to march secretly; anticipate or forestall, or otherwise gain an advantage stealthily, or by address.—To steal overt, to smuggle.

In the Flushing and Low Country's troublesome disorders, some few (by stealing over of victuals and other things from this commonwealth) have made themselves privately rich. Dr. J. Dee (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 69).

= Syn. 1. To filch, pilfer, purloin, embezzle. See pillage, n. II. intrans. 1. To practise or be guilty of theft.

Thou shalt not steal. Ex. xx. 15.

2. To move stealthily or secretly; creep softly; pass, approach, or withdraw surreptitiously and unperceived; go or come furtively; slip or creep along insidiously, silently, or unperceived; make insinuating approach: as, to steal into the house at dusk; the fox stole away: sometimes used reflexively.

Age is so on me stolen that y mote to god me gilde.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 72.

Fix'd of mind . . . to fly all company, one night steal away.

Sir P. Sidney.

He will steal himself into a man's favour, and for a week escape a great deal of discoveries.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 6. 93.

But what has made Sir Peter steal off? I thought he had been with you. Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 3.

Ever does natural beauty steal in like air, and envelop great actions.

Emerson, Misc., p. 25.

steal¹ (stēl), n. [*< steal*¹, v.] An act or a case of theft: as, an official steal; specifically, in base-ball, a stolen or furtive run from one base to another: as, a steal to third base. See *steal*¹, v. t., 9.

steal² (stēl), n. Same as *stale*².

stealer (stē'lēr), n. [*< steal*¹ + -er.] 1. One who steals, in any sense; especially, a thief: as, a cattle-stealer.

The transgression is in the stealer.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 233.

Specifically—2. In ship-building, the foremost or aftmost plank in a strake, which is dropped short of the stem or stern-post and butts against a notch or jog in another plank. Also called stealing-strake.

When the girth of the ship at the midship section is so much in excess of each or either of those at the extremities as to cause the plates to be very narrow if the same number were retained right fore and aft, it becomes necessary to introduce stealers—that is to say, to cause certain plates to stop somewhere between the extremities and midships, and thus reduce the number of strakes which end on the stem and stern post.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 138.

stealing (stē'ling), n. [Verbal n. of *steal*¹, v.]

1. The act of one who steals; theft.

Men are apt to condemn whatever they hear called stealing as an ill action, disagreeing with the rule of right.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxviii. 16.

2. That which is stolen; stolen property: used chiefly in the plural: as, his stealings amounted to thousands of dollars.

stealingly (stē'ling-li), adv. [< ME. stelenlich; < stealing, ppr., + -ly.] By stealing; slyly; secretly. [Rare.]

stealing-strake (stē'ling-strāk), n. Same as stealer, 2.

stealth (stelh), n. [Early mod. E. also stelh; < ME. stelthe, stalthe (= Icel. stuldr = Sw. stöld), stealth, with abstract formative -th, < AS. stēlan, steal: see *steal*¹. Another form, from the Scand., is stouth. The older noun was *stale*¹. Cf. health, *heal*¹, wealth, weal.] 1†. The act of stealing; theft.

Yf that Licurgus should have made it death for the Lacedemonians to steale, they being a people which naturally delighted in stealth. . . there should have bene few Lacedemonians then left. Spenser, State of Ireland.

2†. A thing stolen.

On his backe a heavy load he bare
 Of nightly *stelh*s, and pillage severall.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 16.

3. A secret or clandestine method or proceeding; means secretly employed to gain an object; surreptitious way or manner: used in a good or a bad sense.

Yef it were oon that wolde assay hym-self in eny strange turnement by stelh the vnkownen when they were disguised that they wolde not be knowe till they hadde renomee of grete prowessse. Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 502.

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
 Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.
Pope, Epil. to Satires, i. 136.

4†. A secret going; a stolen or clandestine visit.

I told him of your stealth unto this wood.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 310.

stealthful (stelh'fūl), a. [< stealth + -ful.] Given to stealth; bent on stealing; stealthy. Chapman, tr. of Homer's Hymn to Hermes, 1. 369.

stealthfully (stelh'fūl-i), adv. By stealing; stealthily.

stealthfulness (stelh'fūl-nes), n. Stealthiness.

stealthily (stel'thi-li), adv. In a stealthy manner; by stealth.

stealthiness (stel'thi-nes), n. Stealthy character or action.

stealthy (stel'thi), a. Acting by stealth; sly; secretive in act or manner; employing concealed methods: as, a stealthy foe; characterized by concealment; furtive: as, a stealthy proceeding; a stealthy movement.

Murder . . . with his stealthy pace.
Shak., Macbeth, ii. 1. 54.

Footfalls of stealthy men he seemed to hear.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 321.

See where the stealthy panther left his tracks!

O. W. Holmes, A Family Record.

steam (stēm), n. [< ME. steem, stem, < AS. steim, vapor, smell, smoke, = Fries. stoame = D. stoom, steam; origin unknown.] 1. Vapor; a rising vapor; an exhalation.

Fough! what a steam of brimstone
 Is here!
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, v. 4.

2. Water in a gaseous state; the gas or vapor of water, especially at temperatures above 100° C. It has a specific gravity of .625 as compared with air under the same pressure. It liquefies at 100° C. (212° F.), under a pressure of 14.7 pounds upon a square inch, or the mean pressure of the atmosphere at the sea-level. The temperature at which it liquefies diminishes with the pressure. Steam constantly rises from the surface of liquid water when not obstructed by impervious inclosures or covered by another gas already saturated with it. Its total latent heat of vaporization for 1 pound weight under a pressure of 76 centimeters of mercury (or 14.7 pounds to the square inch) is 965.7 British thermal units, or 536.5 calories for each kilogram. Its specific heat under constant pressure is .485. (Reynold.) It is decomposed into oxygen and hydrogen at temperatures between 1,000° and 2,000° C. (Deville.) In addition to the surface evaporation of water, the change from the liquid to the gaseous state takes place beneath the surface (the gas escaping with ebullition) whenever the temperature of the liquid is raised without a corresponding increase of pressure upon it. The temperature at which this occurs under any particular pressure is the boiling-point for that pressure. The boiling-point of water under the atmospheric pressure at the sea-level is 100° C. or 212° F. Saturated steam has the physical properties common to all gases whose temperatures are near those of their liquefying-points, or the boiling-points of their liquids. Saturated steam when isolated, and superheated at temperatures from 100° to 110° C., and under constant pressure, expands with a given increase of temperature about five times as much as air, and at 186° C. about twice as much as air; and it must be raised to a temperature much higher than this before it will expand uniformly like air. The large quantity of latent heat in steam, its great elasticity, and the ease with which it may be condensed have rendered its use in engines more practicable than that of any other gaseous medium for the generation and application of mechanical power.

3. Water in a visible vesicular condition produced by the condensation of vapor of water in air.—4. Figuratively, force; energy. [Colloq.]

5†. A flame or blaze; a ray of light.

Steam, or lowe of fyre. Flamma. Prompt. Parr., p. 473.

Absolute steam-pressure. See pressure.—Dead steam. Same as exhaust-steam.—Dry steam, saturated steam without any admixture of mechanically suspended water.

High-pressure steam, low-pressure steam. See pressure.—Live steam, steam which has performed no work, or only part of its work, or which is or might be available for the performance of work in an engine.—Saturated steam, steam in contact with water at the same temperature.

In this condition the steam is always at its condensing-point, which is also the boiling-point of the water with which it is in contact. In this it differs from superheated steam of equal tension, which has a temperature higher than its condensing-point at that tension, and higher than the boiling-point of water under the same pressure. Specific steam-volume, in thermodynamics, the volume which a unit of weight of steam assumes under specific conditions of temperature and pressure. Steam fire-engine. See fire-engine, 2.—Steam jet-pump. See pump.—Steam vacuum-pump. See vacuum-pump.—Superheated steam, steam which at any stated pressure has a higher temperature, and for any particular weight of it a greater volume, than saturated steam (which see, above) at the same pressure. Also called steam-gas.—Total heat of steam. Same as steam-heat, 1.—Wet steam, steam holding water mechanically suspended, the water being in the form of spray or vesicles, or both.

steam (stēm), v. [Early mod. E. also steem; < ME. stemen, < AS. stēman, stīman (= D. stoomen), steam, < steam, vapor, steam: see steam, n.] I. intrans. 1. To give out steam or vapor; exhale any kind of fume or vapor.

Ye mists, . . . that . . . rise
 From hill or steaming lake.
Milton, P. L., v. 186.

2. To rise in a vaporous form; pass off in visible vapor.

When the last deadly smoke aloft did steeme.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xii. 2.

3. To move or travel by the agency of steam: as, the vessel steamed into port.

We steamed quietly on, past . . . the crowds of yachts at Ryde, and dropped anchor off Cowes.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. i.

4†. To flame or blaze up.

tubes are reeled for cleaning; g, ash-pit; h, grate; i, steam-dome; j, safety valve; k, steam pipe; l, bridge wall; m, combustion-chamber; n, back connection for passage of Diagram of a steam boiler showing internal components like tubes, grate, and ash-pit.

II. 1. To cut; to chop; to chop up. [Rare.]
To cut up into small pieces; to chop up.
To cut up into small pieces; to chop up.

2. To treat with steam; to expose to steam; to apply steam to for any purpose: as, to steam cloth; to steam potatoes instead of boiling them; to steam food for eat food; steamed bread.

steamboat (stēm'bōt), n. A vessel propelled by steam-power.

steamboat-bug (stēm'bōt-bug), n. A water-nettle of large size, or otherwise conspicuous. [Local, U. S.]

steamboat-coal (stēm'bōt-kōl), n. Coal broken small enough to pass between bars set from 6 to 8 inches apart, but too large to pass between bars less than 5 inches apart. This is the variation of size in different collieries in the Pennsylvania anthracite regions where this size of coal is rarely prepared except to fill special orders, and where alone this term is in use.

steamboating (stēm'bō'ting), n. 1. The business of operating steamboats.—2. Undue hurrying and slighting of work. [Colloq.]—3. A method of cutting many boards for book-covers at one operation, instead of cutting them singly.

steamboat-rolls (stēm'bōt-rōlz), n. pl. The largest rolls used in breaking coal for the market. Also called crushers and crusher-rolls. See steamboat-coal. [Pennsylvania anthracite regions.]

steam-boiler (stēm'boi'ler), n. A receptacle or vessel in which water is heated and boiled to generate steam; particularly, a receptacle or vessel in which the water is confined, or isolated from the external air, in order to generate steam under a pressure equal to or exceeding that of the atmosphere, for the conversion of its expansive force into work in a steam-motor or engine, or for heating purposes. The kinds of steam-boilers in use are very numerous and may be variously classified. In some the parts are rigidly joined together by rivets, bolts, stays, tubes expanded into heads, etc.; in others the parts are easily detachable one from the other, as in what are known as sectional boilers. Another division may be made, with reference to the treatment of the contained water, which in one class of steam-boilers is heated principally in a single mass of considerable cubic capacity, and in another is distributed in small spaces connected with each other and with the steam-space, as in what are known as sectional safety-boilers. A third ground of classification is the mode of applying heat. (See cylindrical steam-boiler, return-flue boiler, horizontal tubular boiler, fire-tube boiler, etc., below.) Boilers are made of wrought-iron or steel plates and tubes, or of cast-iron, or partly of wrought-iron or steel and of cast-iron. Steel of moderate tensile strength has lately been much used for boilers in which high pressures are maintained; and the present tendency of engineering in power-boilers is toward the use of as high pressures as is compatible with good lubrication, or the use of steam at as high a temperature as can be employed without decomposition of lubricants. Sectional boilers are often made partly or wholly of cast-iron, the sections being bolted or screwed together; and cast-iron is also very largely employed for low-pressure boilers used for steam heating.—Circulating steam-boiler, a compound boiler in which the connected parts are unequally heated, the water rising in the more intensely heated parts, and descending in the cooler parts, to insure a rapid circulation of the water constantly in one direction. Compound steam-boiler. (a) A battery of two or more single steam-boilers having their steam- and water-spaces connected, and acting together to supply steam to a heating-apparatus or a steam-engine. (b) A single boiler, or a battery of boilers, combined with other apparatus, as a feed-water heater or a superheater, for facilitating the production or for the superheating of steam. (c) A sectional boiler.—Cornish steam-boiler, the cylindrical flue-boiler invented by Smeaton. See return-flue steam-boiler.—Corrugated furnace steam-boiler, a boiler in which the plates exposed to the direct radiation from the fire and to the hot gases in the furnace are corrugated to give increased strength and to present a more extended heating-surface to the fire.—Cylindrical steam-boiler, a boiler with an exterior cylindrical shell, having flanged heads of much thicker iron fastened to the shell by rivets.—Fire-tube steam-boiler, a boiler in which the heat of the furnace is partly or wholly applied to the interior of tubes which pass through the water-space of the boiler.—Flue steam-boiler, a general name for all steam-boilers with an internal flue or flues, whether vertical, horizontal, or of other construction.—Horizontal flue steam-boiler, a horizontal steam-boiler with one or more flues through its length. (Also called return-flue boiler.) If cylindrical also, it is a horizontal cylindrical flue or return flue boiler.—Horizontal steam-boiler, a steam-boiler in which the flues or tubes are in a horizontal position.—Horizontal tubular steam-boiler, a horizontal boiler with fire-tubes, through which the gases of combustion pass in a manner analogous to their passage through flues, for which the tubes are substitutes, presenting a greater extent of heating-surface than can be obtained in the same space by flues, and effectively tying the heads of the boiler together. A modern form of this boiler is shown in the cuts, which also show the method of setting it in brickwork; a, is the shell; b, b, saddles for supporting the boiler in the masonry; c, d, the furnace-door; e, ash-pit door; f, clean-out door in the boiler-front; f', by which the gases of combustion into the rear ends of the tubes; g, flue in the masonry; h, uptake; i, flanged head; j, tubes; k, side-bars which support the masonry; l, dead-air spaces in the masonry in which the air acts as a heat-insulator. The course of the gases of combustion is indicated by arrows.—Locomotive steam-boiler, a tubular boiler which has a contained furnace and ash-pit, and in which the gases of combustion pass from the furnace directly into horizontal interior tubes (instead of passing first under the boiler, as in the horizontal cylindrical tubular boiler), and after passing through the tubes are conveyed directly into the smoke-box at the opposite end of the tubes. The name is derived from the use of such boilers on locomotive engines, but it is typical in its application to all boilers having the construction described, and used for generating steam for stationary or portable engines, as well as for locomotives.—Marine steam-boiler, a boiler specially designed and adapted for supplying steam to marine engines. Compactness, as little weight as is consistent with strength, effective steaming capacity, and economy in consumption of fuel are the prime requisites of marine boilers. They are usually tubular, and short in proportion to their width, and have water-legs at the sides and water-spaces below and at the backs of their furnaces—that is, their furnaces are entirely surrounded by water-spaces except at the openings for the doors. Marine boilers are now sometimes used with forced draft—that is, air is forced from the outside into the boiler- or fire-rooms (which are sometimes made air-tight) or immediately into the fires by powerful blowers.—Return-flue steam-boiler, a horizontal flue-boiler with one or more interior flues through which the gases of combustion are returned to the front end of the boiler after having passed to the rear from the furnace over the bridge-wall and under the bottom of the shell.—Rotary tubular steam-boiler. See rotary.—Sectional safety steam-boiler, a sectional boiler in which the water is divided into numerous small masses connected with one another by passages large enough for free circulation from one to the other, but not large enough to permit so sudden a release of pressure, in case of rupture of one of the sections, as to cause an explosion.—Tubular steam-boiler, a boiler a prominent feature of which is a series of either fire- or water-tubes.—Vertical steam-boiler, a steam-boiler in which the heating-surface of the tubes or flues is in a vertical position. When constructed with fire-tubes, it is called a vertical tubular boiler.

steam-box (stēm'boks), n. A reservoir for steam above a boiler; a steam-chest.

steam-brake (stēm'brāk), n. A brake applied by the action of steam admitted to a steam-cylinder the piston of which is connected by rods to the levers which apply the brake-shoes.

steam-car (stēm'kär), n. A car drawn or driven by steam-power; a railway-car. [U. S.]

steam-carriage (stēm'kar'äj), n. A road-carriage driven by steam-power.

steam-case (stēm'käs), n. Same as steam-chest.

steam-chamber (stēm'chäm'bér), n. 1. A box or chamber in which articles are placed to be steamed.—2. A steam-chest.—3. A steam-dome.—4. The steam-room or steam-space in a boiler or engine.

steam-chest (stēm'chest), n. 1. The chamber in which the slide-valve of a steam-engine works. See cuts under passenger-engine, rock-drill, and slide-valve.—2. In calico-printing, a metallic vessel or tank in which printed cloths are steamed to fix their colors.

steam-chimney (stēm'chim'ni), n. An annular chamber around the chimney of a boiler-furnace for superheating steam.

steam-cock (stēm'kok), n. A faucet or valve in a steam-pipe.

steam-coil (stēm'kōil), n. A coil of pipe, either made up flat with return bends or in spiral form, used to impart heat to a room or other inclosed space or to a liquid, or, by exposure of its exterior surface to air-currents or contact of cold water, to act as a condenser.

steam-color (stēm'kul'or), n. In dyeing, a color which is developed and fixed by the action of steam after the cloth is printed.

steam-crane (stēm'krän), n. A crane worked by steam, frequently carrying the steam-engine upon the same frame.

steam-cutter (stēm'kut'ér), n. A ship's boat, smaller than a launch, propelled by steam.

steam-cylinder (stēm'sil'in-dér), n. The cylinder in which the piston of a steam-engine reciprocates.—Starting steam-cylinder. Same as starting-engine.

steam-dome (stēm'döm), n. A chamber connected with the steam-space and projecting above the top of a steam-boiler. From it the steam passes to the cylinder of a steam-engine, or to steam-heating apparatus. See cut under steam-boiler.

steam-dredger (stēm'drej'ér), n. A dredging-machine operated by steam.

steam-engine (stēm'en'jin), n. An engine in which the mechanical force arising from the elasticity and expansive action of steam, or from its property of rapid condensation, or from the combination of the two, is made available as a motive power. The invention of the steam-engine has been ascribed by the English to the Marquis of Worcester, who published an account of it about the middle of the seventeenth century. By the French the invention has been ascribed to Papin, toward the close of the same century. Papin's plan contained the earliest suggestion of a vacuum under a piston by the agency of steam. The first actual working steam-engine of which there is any record was invented and constructed by Captain Savery, an Englishman, to whom a patent was granted for it in 1698. This engine was employed to raise water by the expansion and condensation of steam. The steam-engine received great improvements from the hands of Newcomen, Beighton, and others. Still it was imperfect and rude in its construction, and was chiefly applied to the draining of mines or the raising of water. Up to this time it was properly an atmospheric engine (see atmospheric), for the actual moving power was the pressure of the atmosphere, the steam only producing a vacuum under the piston. The steam-engine was brought to a high state of perfection by James Watt about the year 1782. The numerous and vital improvements introduced by him, both in the combination of its mechanism and in the economy of its management, have rendered the steam-engine at once the most powerful, the most easily applied and regulated, and generally speaking the least expensive of all prime movers for im-

The upper figure is a front view, the under, a rear view.

The steam-valve A and exhaust valve A' are in lepton lent of each other, and have cylindrical bearing surfaces. An oscillatory motion is given to them by rods B, connecting with an oscillating disk C which is pivoted upon the sole of the steam-cylinder, and is worked by an intermediate rock-lever D, driven by the eccentric rod E, connected with an eccentric upon the main shaft. The motions of the exhaust-valves are positive, but those of the inlet-valves are varied by means of spring-catches a, which are adjustable to determine the points of opening and the range of motion of the valves, and are also controlled in their disengagement of the valve-stems by the governor F, rock-lever G, connecting-rods H, and rock-levers i, all connected together in such manner that an extremely small increase or decrease of speed in the rotation of the fly-wheel shaft causes the inlet-valves to be released and to close correspondingly earlier or later in the stroke. The closing is performed by exterior weights suspended from short levers on the valve-stems by the rods k, the motion of closing being controlled by dash-pots at d, only the covers of which are shown. The other parts of the engine, which are common to most reciprocating engines, are: 1, the slide-valve; 2, cylinder; 3, piston; 4, piston-rod; 5, stuffing-box; 6, sliding-block or cross-head; 7, connecting-rod or pitman; 8, rod-end fitted to 9, the crank-wrist; 10, fly-wheel; 11, crank keyed to 12, the crank-shaft; 13, centrifugal lubricating tube; 14, steam-pipe; 15, lubricator; 16, exhaust pipe.

pulling machinery of every description. The steam-engine is properly a heat-engine, and the total work L is expressed theoretically by the equation in which Q represents the total heat converted into work per unit of weight, G weight of steam, and A the thermal equivalent of a unit of work, while T and T are respectively the higher and lower limits of temperature between which the steam is worked, T, being the absolute temperature at which the steam is induced to the engine, and T the absolute temperature at which it is exhausted from it. Inspection of the equation shows that the work performed must vary directly as the factor $(T_1 - T_2)$ varies—that is, the greater the difference which can be maintained between the temperature of induction and that of eduction the greater is the amount of work performed by any given weight of steam. It is in accordance with this law that much higher steam-pressures are now adopted than were formerly employed. The factor $(T_1 - T_2)$ is commonly called the temperature range or fall. The varieties of steam-engines are extremely numerous. (For names of various types, with explanations of their characteristic features, see below.) The specific differences between steam-engines of the same type of construction consist chiefly in their valve-gear. (See valve-gear, governor, 6, regulator, n, slide-valve (with cut), and piston-valve.) Of the total steam-power employed in modern industry on land, that supplied by steam-engines of the horizontal type far exceeds that furnished by steam-engines of all other types put together. Vertical direct-acting engines of large size are little used, but small engines of this type are much employed. Steam-engines of the rotary type are scarcely used except for some kinds of steam hoisting-engines. Double, triple, and quadruple expansion steam-engines are now largely used in marine engineering. Many double expansion stationary engines are in use, and the economical value of the compound system has been demonstrated both theoretically and practically. — Agricultural steam-engine, a portable engine with a boiler, often specially adapted to burn light fuel, as chaff or straw, either by itself or in connection with wood or coal. — Annular steam-engine, a steam engine having an annular piston working in an annular steam-cylinder, and having two diametrically placed piston-rods connected with the cross-head, the latter also being connected by rods to a guide-block working in the hollow cylinder forming the center of the annular steam-cylinder, this guide-block being connected with the crank by a pitman. — Atmospheric steam-engine. See atmospheric engine, under atmospheric. — Beam steam-engine, an engine in which a working-beam connects the connecting-rod with the crank-pitman, and transmits power from one to the other. See beam-engine. — Compound steam-engine, a steam-engine having two steam-cylinders of unequal size, from the smaller of which the steam, after use, passes into the larger cylinder, and completes its work by expanding against the piston in the latter. — Concentric steam-engine. Same as rotary steam-engine. — Condensing steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the exhaust-steam is condensed, for the purpose of removing the back-pressure of the atmosphere from the exhaust, and also to economize fuel by saving heat otherwise wasted. See condenser, and cut under pulsometer. — Cornish steam-engine, a single-acting condensing steam pumping-engine, first used in the mines of Cornwall. It is also used as a pumping-engine for supplying water to cities. Steam-pressure is not used to raise the water, but to lift a long loaded pump-rod, whose weight in its descent is the power employed to force up the water. The motion is regulated by a kind of hydraulic regulator invented by Smeaton, and called a catapult. — Direct-acting steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the power of the piston is transmitted to the crank without the intervention of levers, side-beams, or a working-beam. — Disk steam-engine, a form of rotary engine in which the steam-pistons act successively against a revolving disk set at an angle to the plane of rotation, thus imparting a gyratory motion to a central shaft upon which the disk is mounted, the end of this shaft being connected with a crank turning in the plane of rotation. — Double-acting steam-engine, the ordinary form of steam-engine, in which the steam acts upon both sides of the piston. — Double-cylinder steam-engine, a steam-engine having two steam-cylinders acting in combination with each other. See compound steam-engine. — Double expansion steam-engine. (a) A double-cylinder steam-engine in which steam is used expansively. (b) A compound steam-engine. — Double steam-engine, a steam-engine having two cylinders in which the pistons make either simultaneous or alternate strokes and are connected with the same crank-shaft. — Duplex steam-engine. Same as double steam-engine. — High-pressure steam-engine. See high pressure, under pressure. — High-speed steam-engine, a somewhat indefinite name for a reciprocating engine working at a high speed as compared with the much slower speed of engines with the Corliss and other a, high-pressure cylinder; b, low-pressure cylinder; c, in location and reduction valve for a in position of exhaust from lower end and of induction to upper end of cylinder; d, passage for steam from a to b; e, induction and reduction valve for b; f, g, balance-plates for valves of a and b; h, i, pistons; h, h', piston-rods; i, i', cross-heads; j, j', slipper-guides for cross-heads; k, k', connecting-rods; l, l', cranks; m, crank-shaft; n, shaft which drives feed-pump and also bilge-pump not shown on the opposite side; o, worm on main shaft entering into worm-wheel q on the shaft m, and actuating pump plungers by crank and pitman connection; r, r', eccentrics; s, s', eccentric-rods; t, t', links connected by link-blocks with valve-stems u, u'; v, crank-lever which turns a segmental worm-gear, keyed to the rock-shaft w carrying the rocker-arms x, x', for reversing high-pressure and low-pressure valves respectively; y, bed-plate; z, columns supporting the cylinders; aa, tie-rods for stiffening the columns; ab, exhaust from low-pressure cylinder to the condenser (not shown); ac, butterfly throttle-valve; ad, gear for operating throttle-valve; ae, relief valves.

piston. The name is sometimes given to reciprocating engines which have a fly-wheel and crank-shaft. E. H. Knight. — Rotary steam-engine. Same as rotary steam-engine. — Semi-portable steam-engine, a steam-engine which is movable with its foundation-plate, as distinguished from an engine mounted on wheels, and from one resting on a fixed foundation. — Triple expansion steam-engine, a steam-engine that expands its steam in three successive stages and in three separate and distinct cylinders, one taking its steam from the boiler, and each of the others taking its steam from the exhaust of the cylinder working at the next higher pressure. This type of marine engine is found at the present time on many of the swiftest steamships, but may be in turn superseded by the quadruple expansion-engine. — Vertical steam-engine, a steam-engine whose piston reciprocates vertically.

steamer (sté'mér), n. [< steam + -er-1.] One who or that which steams, in any sense. Specifically—(a) A steam-box. (b) A person employed in steaming oysters in shucking them for canning. (c) In calico-printing, one who steams printed cloth for fixing steam-colors. (d) One who steams wood for bending, etc. (e) A steam-generator or boiler: as, the boiler is an excellent steamer. (f) Especially, a vessel propelled by steam; a steamship. (g) A fire-engine the pumps of which are worked by steam. (h) A vessel in which articles are subjected to the action of steam, as in washing or cooking. See steam-heat, 2. (i) In paper-making, a vessel in which old paper, fiber, etc., are treated in order to soften them. (j) An apparatus for steaming grain preparatory to grinding. (k) A locomotive for roads. See road-steamer.

steamer-cap (sté'mér-kap), n. Same as fore-and-aft, 2.

steamer-duck (sté'mér-duk), n. A South American duck of the genus Micropterus (or Tachyeres); a race-horse. See Micropterus, 2. This duck becomes when adult incapable of flight, but swims very rapidly, with a movement which has suggested the action of a side-wheel steamboat (whence the name).

steam-excavator (stém'eks'kä-vā-tor), n. Same as navvy, 3.

steam-fountain (stém'foun'tān), n. See fountain.

steam-gage (stém'gāj), n. An attachment to a boiler to indicate the pressure of steam; a pressure-gage. There are many forms. One of the older is a bent tube partially filled with mercury, one end of which connects with the boiler, so that the steam raises a, hollow bent tube attached to case at a', and receiving condensed water or steam under pressure through the opening at f; b, link connecting end of tube a with short arm of rock-lever c, which has at the upper end a small rack intermeshing with a pinion on the spindle of the index d; e, small coiled spring which acts upon the spindle of the index or pointer in a direction opposed to the action of the rack and pinion; f, dial, on which the figures indicate pressures (in pounds) above the atmospheric pressure.

the mercury according to the amount of pressure. A very common form of gage is that known as Bourdon's, which consists essentially of a flattened metal tube, closed at one end and bent circularly, into which the steam is admitted. As such a tube tends to straighten itself out by the force of the steam, the amount of pressure can easily be ascertained by an attached index-apparatus. — Electric steam-gage, an attachment to a steam-boiler for indicating at a distance the pressure of the steam. One form consists of a bent tube filled with mercury, which, as it rises under the pressure, closes a series of electrical circuits after the manner of a thermostat. Another form employs the expansion or movement of an ordinary steam-gage diaphragm as a circuit-closer. The closing of the circuit in each case serves to sound an alarm.

steam-gas (stém'gas), n. Same as superheated steam (which see, under steam).

steam-generator (stém'jen'gē-rā-tor), n. A steam-boiler.

steam-governor (stém'gouv'ēr-nor), n. See governor, 6.

steam-gun (stém'gun), n. A gun the projectile force of which is derived from the expansion of steam issuing through the shotted tube.

steam-hammer (stém'ham'ēr), n. A forging-hammer operated by steam-power. It has assumed several forms, but now consists of a vertical and inverted steam-cylinder with piston and piston-rod (the rod passing through the lower cylinder-head and carrying at the end a mass of metal which forms the hammer), an anvil directly beneath the hammer and cylinder, a supporting framework, and suitable valves for the control of the steam. Steam is used to raise and may also be used to drive down the hammer. By means of the valve-system, steam is admitted below the piston to raise the hammer and to sustain it while the metal to be forged is placed on the anvil. To deliver a blow, the steam is exhausted below the piston, and the hammer is allowed to fall by its own weight. To augment the blow, live steam may be admitted above the piston to assist in driving it downward. To deliver a gentle blow, the exhaust-steam below the piston may be retained to act as a cushion. Blows can be delivered at any point of the stroke, quickly or slowly, lightly or with the full power of the combined weight of the hammer and force of steam-pressure; or the machine may be used as a vise or squeezer. All modern steam-hammers of the type described are modifications of the original Nasmyth steam-hammer illustrated in the cut. Steam-

a, anvil; b, frame; c, hammer-head; d, guides; e, piston-rod; f, valve-chests containing valves that control induction of steam to and reduction from the cylinder h; h', steam-pipe; g, rock-lever (moved by the rod z) connected with the valve-stems and moving the valves; j, tripping-mechanism by which the hammer is caused to descend from any part of the upstroke, the adjusting gear k being manipulated by a workman standing on the platform l.

hammers of the largest class have been made with hammers weighing eighty tons. Another type of steam-hammer consists of two horizontal steam-cylinders placed in line, the hammers meeting over an anvil on which the forging rests.

steam-heat (stém'hēt), n. 1. In thermodynamics, the total heat required to produce steam at any tension from water at 0° C. or 32° F. It is the sum of the sensible heat and the latent heat expressed in thermal units. — 2. Heat imparted by the condensation of steam in coils, pipes, or radiators.

steam-hoist (stém'hoist), n. A lift or elevator operated by a steam-engine.

steam-house (stém'hous), n. In oyster-canning, a house or room where oysters are steamed.

steaminess (stém'i-nes), n. Steamy or vaporous character or quality; mistiness.

steam-jacket (stém'jak'et), n. An inclosure adapted for receiving steam, and applying the heat of the steam to a kettle, tank, steam-cylinder, etc., surrounded by such inclosure.

steam-jet (stém'jet), n. A blast of steam caused to issue from a nozzle.

steam-joint (stém'joint), n. A joint that is steam-tight.

steam-kettle (stém'ket'l), n. A vessel heated by steam, and used for various purposes. The High-speed Steam-engine.

types of valve-gears. In general it may be said that engines of considerable power, making one hundred turns per minute and upward, are high-speed engines. — Horizontal steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the piston works horizontally. — Inclined-cylinder steam-engine, a form of marine engine having cylinders inclined to the horizontal. — Inverted-cylinder steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the cross-head is placed below the cylinder. This construction is much used for marine engines, and to some extent for stationary engines. — Low-pressure steam-engine. See low pressure, under pressure. — Marine steam-engine, a steam-engine specially designed for marine propulsion. The best modern types are condensing, short-stroke, double, triple, or quadruple expansion-engines of the inverted-cylinder type. Marine engines for steam-tugs are for the most part single and often non-condensing. See cut in next column. — Non-condensing steam-engine, an engine that exhausts its steam without condensation. See non-condensing. — Oscillating steam-engine, a steam-engine whose cylinder oscillates on trunnions and has its piston-rod directly connected with the crank. Double engines of this type have been considerably used for marine propulsion, and some are still employed. — Overhead steam-engine. See overhead. — Quadruple expansion steam-engine, a steam-engine which, taking its steam at high pressure, expands it in four different operations successively, and in four distinct and separate steam-cylinders. The pistons of the cylinders are connected by piston-rods, cross-heads, and connecting-rods with cranks attached to a common shaft, to which rotary motion is imparted by the coacting pistons. — Reciprocating steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the power of steam is applied to a reciprocating piston. — Revolving-cylinder steam-engine, a steam-engine of which the cylinder is so mounted that it is caused to rotate by the reciprocation of the piston. Compare rotary steam-engine. — Rotary steam-engine, a steam-engine in which the piston rotates in the cylinder, or the cylinder upon the steam-kettle (stēm'ket'l), n. A kettle for boiling or cooking food, heated by steam.

steam-launch (stēm'launch), n. See launch.

steam-propeller (stēm'prō-pel'ēr), n. A steam-engine.

steam-oven (stēm'uv'n), n. An oven heated by steam at high pressure.

steam-packet (stēm'pak'et), n. A packet propelled by steam. Compare packet, n., 2.

steam-pan (stēm'pan), n. A vessel with a double bottom forming a steam-chamber. See steam-pan.

steam-pipe (stēm'pip), n. Any pipe in which steam is conveyed. Specifically (a) A pipe which leads from a boiler to an engine, pan, tank, etc., or from the boiler to a condenser or to the open air. (b) In a steam-heating or drying apparatus or system, a name given to any one of the steam-supply pipes, in contradistinction to the corresponding return pipe through which water of condensation is returned to the boiler.

steam-plow (stēm'plou), n. A gang-plow designed to be drawn by a wire rope, and operated by steam-power. Such a plow has usually eight shares arranged in a frame, four pointing in one direction and four in the other. The frame is balanced on a pair of wheels in the center, and forms an angle in the middle, so that when one half the plows are in use the others are raised above the ground. Steam plows are used with either one or two engines. If with two engines, the plow is drawn forward and backward between them, each engine being advanced the width of the furrows after each passage of the plow. If one engine only is used, snatch-blocks and movable anchors are employed to hold the rope, the anchors being automatically advanced after each passage of the plow. Traction-engines also have been used to drag plows. See anchor, porter, and plow.

steam-port (stēm'pōrt), n. 1. In a slide-valve steam-engine, the name given to each of two oblong passages from the steam-chest to the inside of the cylinder, which afford passage to the steam to and from the cylinder, and act alternately as an induction-port and an eduction-port. See cut under slide-valve.—2. A passage for steam into or out of any inclosure.

steam-power (stēm'pou'ēr), n. The power of steam applied to move machinery or produce any other result.

steam-press (stēm'pres), n. A press actuated by steam-power acting directly or intermediately; specifically, a printing-press worked by steam.

steam-printing (stēm'prin'ting), n. Printing done by machinery moved by steam, as opposed to printing by hand-labor on hand-presses.

steam-propeller (stēm'prō-pel'ēr), n. Same as steam-propeller (which see, under scare 1).

steam-pump (stēm'pump), n. See pump 1 and vacuum pump.

steam-radiator (stēm'rā'di-ā-tōr), n. A nest or collection of iron pipes in tanks or coils, through which steam is passed to heat a room, etc. See cuts under radiator.

steam-ram (stēm'ram), n. See ram 2, 2.

steam-regulator (stēm'reg'ū-lā-tōr), n. See regulator, 2.

steam-room (stēm'rōm), n. In a steam-engine, etc., the space which is occupied by steam.

steamship (stēm'ship), n. A ship propelled by steam.

steam-space (stēm'spās), n. A space occupied, or designed to be occupied, by steam only; particularly, in a steam-boiler, the space allowed above the water-line for holding a quantity of steam.

steam-table (stēm'tā'bl), n. 1. A bench or table fitted with shallow steam-tight tanks; used in restaurants, etc., to keep cooked dishes warm.—2. A tabular arrangement of data relating to steam-pressures, temperatures, and quantities of heat.

steam-tank (stēm'tangk), n. A chamber or inclosed vessel in which materials of any kind are treated either by direct contact with steam or with steam-heat by means of pipes coiled in the tank or a steam-jacket. Such tanks are used in many industries, and are made in many forms, as for steaming coal, paper, stock, lard, etc. See condensing tank.

steam-tight (stēm'tit), a. Capable of resisting the passage of steam, as a joint in a steam-pipe.

steam-toe (stēm'tō), n. In a steam-engine, a projection on a lifting-rod, which is raised by it through the action of a cam, tappet, or wiper.

steam-trap (stēm'trap), n. A contrivance for permitting the passage of water of condensation out of pipes, radiators, steam-engine cylinders, etc., while preventing that of steam.

steam-tug (stēm'tug), n. A steamer used for towing ships, boats, rafts, fishing-nets, oyster-dredges, etc. Such vessels are furnished with engines very powerful in proportion to the size of their hulls, and usually carry only sufficient coal for short trips.—Steam-tug heart-murmur, the combination of an aortic regurgitant with an aortic obstructive murmur.

steam-valve (stēm'valv), n. A valve which controls the opening of a steam-pipe or steam-port.

steam-vessel (stēm'ves'el), n. Same as steam-ship.

steam-wagon (stēm'wag'on), n. Same as steam-carriage.

steam-wheel (stēm'hvēl), n. A rotary steam-engine. See steam-engine.

steam-whistle (stēm'hvī'sl), n. A sounding device connected with the boiler of a steam-

Fig. 1 is the simplest form of steam whistle, with adjustable lever z, which acts on the valve p, its motion being limited by a stop pin at h. Steam passes through a pipe connected at l when the valve p is opened. The steam issues through openings in the base y, and, passing over the lower edge of the bell a, causes a powerful vibration producing the sound, the pitch of which depends upon the length of the bell. Fig. 2 is a chime-whistle consisting of three bells, a, b, c, tuned to emit the common chord or some inversion of it. It receives steam at l, and by branches m, n, together with l, distributes it to the several bells y. Fig. 3 is a piston-whistle. Its base y and bell p operate as described for the other whistles, the steam entering at p. The tone of the whistle is changed by moving up and down the piston s by means of the stem q.

engine, either stationary, locomotive, or marine, for the purpose of announcing hours of work, signaling, etc.

steam-winch (stēm'winch), n. A form of winch or hoisting-apparatus in which rotatory motion is imparted to the winding axle from the piston-rod of a steam-engine, directly, or indirectly by means of bevel-gearing, the direct action giving most rapidly, the indirect most power.

steam-worm (stēm'wērm), n. A spiral steam-coil. Such coils are used in tanks for heating liquids, as tan-liquor in tanneries, water in laundries, dye-works, etc., the liquid being placed in the tank enveloping the coil, while steam is passed through the latter. They are also used in some forms of calorimeter.

steamy (stē'mi), a. [Steam + -y.] Consisting of or abounding in steam; resembling steam; vaporous; misty.

The bubbling and loud hissing urn Throws up a steamy column. Cooper, Task, iv. 39.
I found an evening hour in the steamy heat of the Haram equal to half a dozen afternoons.
R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 272.

steam-yacht (stēm'yot), n. A yacht propelled by steam, or by steam and sails.

steal. See steal, steal, steal, steal.

stealing, n. See stealing.

steapsin (stēp'sin), n. A ferment of the pancreatic secretion which to some extent resolves fats into fatty acids and glycerin.

stearate (stē'a-rāt), n. [Stearic + -ate.] A salt of stearic acid. The neutral stearates of the alkalis are soaps.

stearic (stē-ar'ik), a. [Irreg. for stearic*, < Gr. στεαρ (stear), stiff fat, tallow, suet; see stearite.] Of or pertaining to suet or fat; obtained from stearin. Stearic acid, $C_{18}H_{35}O_2$, a monobasic acid, forming brilliant white scaly crystals. It is odorless, tasteless, insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether. It burns like wax, and is used for making candles. Its compounds with the alkalis, earths, and metallic oxides are called stearates. Stearic acid exists in combination with glycerin as stearin, in beef- and mutton-fat, and in several vegetable fats, such as the butter of cacao. It is obtained from stearin by saponification and decomposition by an acid of the soap formed, and also from mutton-suet by a similar process.

stearin (stē'a-rin), n. [Stearic + -in.] 1. An ether or glyceride, $C_3H_5O_3(C_{18}H_{35}O_2)_3$, formed by the combination of stearic acid and glycerin. When crystallized it forms white pearly scales, soft to the touch but not greasy, and odorless and tasteless when pure. It is insoluble in water, but soluble in hot alcohol and ether. When treated with superheated steam it is separated into stearic acid and glycerin, and when boiled with alkalis is saponified—that is, the stearic acid combines with the alkali, forming soap, and glycerin is separated. When melted it resembles wax. There are three stearins, which may all be regarded as derivatives of glycerin in which one, two, or three OH groups are replaced by the radical stearyl. Natural stearin is the tristearyl derivative of glycerin. It is the chief ingredient in suet, tallow, and the harder fats, and may be prepared by repeated solution in ether and crystallization. Candle-pitch, chandlers' gum, or residuary gum, used in the manufacture of roofing-cements, is a by-product of this manufacture. 2. A popular name for stearic acid as used in making candles.—Lard-stearin, the residue left after the expression of the oil from lard.

stearin (stē'a-rin-ēr-i), n. [Stearin + -ery.] The process of making stearin from animal or vegetable fats; the manufacture of stearin or stearin products.

stearone (stē'a-rōn), n. [Stearic + -one.] A substance ($C_{35}H_{70}O$) obtained by the partial decomposition of stearic acid. It is a volatile liquid, and seems to be stearic acid deprived of two equivalents of carbonic acid.

stearoptene (stē-a-rōp'tēn), n. [Irreg. < Gr. στεαρ, stiff fat, tallow, suet, + πτερός, winged (volatile).] The solid crystalline substance separated from any volatile oil on long standing or at low temperatures. See oleoptene.

stearyl (stē'a-ril), n. [Stearic + -yl.] The radical of stearic acid ($C_{18}H_{35}O$).

stearin (stē'a-rin), n. Same as stearin.

stearinum (stē-a-ti-num), n. [NL. < Gr. στεαρ, neut. of στεαρός, of or pertaining to tallow or suet, < στεαρ (stear), stiff fat, tallow, suet; see stearite.] A name given to certain pharmaceutical preparations similar to cerates, but containing considerable tallow.—Stearinum iodoformi, stearinum composed of mutton-tallow 18 parts, expressed oil of nutmeg 2 parts, powdered iodoform 1 part.

stearite (stē'a-tit), n. [= F. stearite, < L. stearitis, < Gr. στεαρ, used only as equiv. to στεαρός, στεαρός, of dough made of flour of spelt, < στεαρ (stear), also στεαρ, also contr. στέαρ (with rare gen. στέαρ, also στάρ), stiff fat, tallow, suet, also dough made of flour of spelt, prob. < ιστάει (√ στα), cause to stand, fix; see stand.] Soapstone: an impure massive variety of talc. Also called potstone.

stearitic (stē-a-tit'ik), a. [Stearite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stearite or soapstone; made of stearite.

stearogenous (stē-a-toj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. στεαρ (stear), fat, + -γενής, producing; see -genous.] Tending to produce stearosis (see stearosis, 2): as, stearogenous processes.

stearoma (stē-a-tō'mā), n.; pl. stearomata (-mā-tā). [< Gr. στεάτωμα, a kind of fatty tumor, < στεαρ (stear), fat, tallow, suet.] A lipoma.

stearomatous (stē-a-tōm'a-tus), a. [< stearoma (t-) + -ous.] Of the nature of a stearoma.

stearopyga (stē'a-tō-pi-gā), n. [NL. < Gr. στεαρ (stear), fat, tallow, suet, + πύγη, the rump.] An accumulation of fat on the buttocks of certain Africans, especially Hottentot women.

stearopygous (stē'a-tō-pi-gus), a. [NL. stearopyga + -ous.] Affected with or characterized by stearopyga; having enormously fat buttocks. R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 60.

stearopygy (stē'a-tō-pi-jī), n. [< stearopygous + -y.] The development of stearopyga, or the state of being stearopygous. Jour. Anthropol., XVIII. 17.

Steatornis (stē'a-tōr-nis), n. [NL. (Humboldt, 1817), < Gr. στεαρ (stear), fat, tallow, suet, + ὄρνις, a bird.] The representative genus of Steatornithidae. The only species is S. caripensis, the guacharo or oil-bird of South America, found from Venezuela to Peru, and also in Trinidad, of frugivorous and nocturnal habits. The bird resembles and is usually classed with the goatsuckers. It is so fat that the natives prepare from it a kind of oil used for butter. See cut under guacharo.

stearnithic (stē'a-tōr-nith'ik), a. Having the characters of Steatornis.

Steatornithidae (stē'a-tōr-nith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Steatornis (-ornith-) + -idae.] A family of picarian birds, represented by the genus Steatornis. It is related to the Caprimulgidae, and is often associated with them, but differs in many important characters, and in some respects approaches the owls. The sternum has a single notch on each side behind. The palate is desmognathous, with united maxillopalatines and peculiarly shaped palatines. There are bispretygoid processes, and the rostrum of the skull is compressed. The second pectoral muscle is small, and the femoro-caudal is wanting. The syrinx is entirely bronchial, and hence paired. The oil-gland is very large. The plumage is not aftershafted, and the rectrices are ten. There is only one genus and one species. See cut under guacharo.

steatornithine (stē-ā-tōr-ni-thin), a. [< Steatornis (ornith-) + -ine]. Steatornithic; of or pertaining to the Steatornithidae.

steatorrhea, steatorrhœa (stē-ā-tō-rē-ā), n. [N.L., < Gr. steap (steat-), fat, suet, tallow, + rha, a flow, < pair, flow]. 1. Schorrhœa.—2. The passage of fatty stools.

steatosis (stē-ā-tō-sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. steap (steat-), fat, tallow, suet, + -osis]. 1. Fatty degeneration or infiltration.—2. Any disease of the sebaceous glands. Also called steatopathia. Steatozoön (stē-ā-tō-zō-on), n. Same as Demodex.

stedt, n. An obsolete form of stead. steadfast, steadfastly, etc. See steadfast, etc. steed (stēd), n. [*< ME. stede, < AS. steda, a stud-horse, stallion, war-horse (cf. gestēd-hors, stud-horse; leel, stēdda for stadda, a mare; Sw. sto, a mare), < stōd, a stud; see stool]. (f. stool, stote, stool.) A horse: now chiefly poetical.

The kyng alighte of his stede.

The fiend, . . . like a proud steed rein'd, went haughtily on, Champing his iron curb.

Milton, P. L., iv. 535.

steedless (stēd'less), a. [< steed + -less]. Having no steeds or horses. Whittier, The Norsemen.

steedyokest, n. pl. Reins; thongs. [Rare.]

Sorrowful Hector . . .

Harried in steedyokes as of east.

Stanhurst, Æneid, ii.

steek (stēk), v. [Also steik; obs. or dial. (Sc.) form of stitch]. 1. trans. To pierce with a sharp-pointed instrument; stitch or sew with a needle.—2. To close or shut: as, to steek one's eyes. Burns. [Obsolete or Scotch in both uses.]

But doors were steek'd, and windows bar'd,

And name wad let him in Willie and May Margaret (Child's Ballads, II. 172).

II. intrans. To close; shut.

It es callide cloyster for it cloyss and steekys, and warely sall be lokked.

Religious Pieces (E. E. T. S.), p. 50.

steek (stēk), n. [Also steik; a dial. (Sc.) form of stitch]. The act of stitching with a needle; a stitch. [Scotch.]

steel (stēl), n. and a. [*< ME. steel, stel, stiel, stil, < AS. *stēle, stýle, earliest forms stēli, stēli = MD. stael, D. staal = MLG. stāl, LG. staal = OHG. stahāl, stāl, MHG. stahel, stahel, stāl, G. stahl = Icel. stāl = Sw. stål = Dan. staal = Goth. stahla = OPruss. stakla, steel; root unknown. The words gold and silver also have no L. or Gr. or other cognate terms outside of Teut. and Slavic. I. n. 1. A modified form of iron, not occurring in nature, but known and manufactured from very early times, and at the present time of the highest importance in its various applications to the wants of man. For certain purposes, and especially for the manufacture of tools and weapons, there is no metal or metallic alloy which could take the place of steel. The most essential features of steel as compared with iron are elasticity and hardness, and these qualities can be varied in amount to a very extraordinary degree, in the same piece of steel, by slight changes in the manipulation. Steel can be hardened so as to cut glass by rapid cooling after being strongly heated, and it can be tempered, by reheating after hardening, so as permanently to take the precise degree of hardness best adapted to the use to which it is to be applied. (See temper.) Steel has been known from very early times, but where and how first manufactured is not known. That it has long been in use in India, and that it is still manufactured in that country by methods precisely similar to those in use long ago are well-known facts. (See wootz.) It is thought by some to have been known to the pyramid-builders; but this has not yet been demonstrated, and the same is true of the ancient Semites. The words translated 'steel' in the authorized version of the Old Testament signify 'copper' or 'bronze,' and are usually rendered 'brass,' 'brazen.' That steel was clearly recognized as something distinct from iron by the author or authors of the Homeric poems cannot be proved. The earliest known and simplest method of reducing iron from its ore—the so-called 'direct process'—is capable also of furnishing steel, although a sufficiently homogeneous product cannot be easily obtained by this method. This would explain how steel became known at an early period, and why it was so long before it became an article of general use, with well-established methods of manufacture. Steel is a form of iron in which the amount of carbon is intermediate between that in wrought-iron and that in cast-iron, and this carbon does not exist in the steel in the form of graphite, but is either combined with or dissolved in it; but the subject of the relation of carbon to iron is one of difficulty, and is now undergoing investigation at the hands of various skilled metallurgical chemists. Other ingredients besides carbon are also present in steel—namely, silicon, manganese, sulphur, and phosphorus. Of these the two first mentioned are probably never entirely wanting, and they are not especially undesirable or injurious, as is the case with the two others, of which only traces can be permitted in the best quality of steel. They are all, however, different from carbon, which latter is regarded as an essential element of steel, while the others may be looked upon as being more or less of the nature of impurities. The quality of steel varies with the amount of carbon present, and the effect of this latter element varies with the amount of impurity (silicon, etc.) present in the steel. The larger the amount of impurity, the larger is the quantity of carbon required to give to the iron the character of steel. In the case of the best bar-iron, a little over 0.3 per cent. of carbon is sufficient to give it a steel character; from 0.5 to 0.65 per cent. of carbon, according to the purity of the iron, gives a steel which can be hardened so as to strike fire with flint. Iron containing from 1 to 1.5 per cent. of carbon gives steel which, after tempering, combines the maximum hardness with the maximum tenacity. One per cent. of carbon gives, on the whole, the most generally useful steel. With more than 1.5 per cent. of carbon the tenacity and weldability of the steel are diminished, although the hardness may be increased. With more than 1.74 per cent. of carbon the steel ceases to be weldable, and is with difficulty drawn out under the hammer; and from 1.8 to 2.0 per cent. is usually considered as the limit between steel and cast-iron, the steel with that amount breaking when hammered after softening by heat. Since steel is intermediate between wrought- and cast-iron in the amount of carbon which it contains, it is evident that it might be made either by carburizing the former or decarburizing the latter. The method of carburizing, or cementation as it is generally called, is one of the oldest, perhaps the most ancient, as, although differing greatly in the details, in the essentials it is the same as the process by which the Indian wootz is manufactured. The cementation process was described in detail by Réaumur in a work published in 1722. By this method blister-steel is obtained, and this is further worked up into spring, shear, and double-shear steel by one or more processes of fagoting, welding, and hammering or rolling, the object of this being to give the metal greater homogeneity. A great addition to the value of this process was the invention by Huntsman, in 1740, of cast-steel, the product of the fusion in crucibles, under suitable manipulation, of blister-steel, which process is still in use as first arranged almost without change. By this method, when iron of a sufficiently high grade is used, the finest quality of steel is produced, and it is only steel manufactured in this way which can be used for the best tools, weapons, and cutting instruments of all kinds. The methods of producing steel by the decarburization of pig-iron are numerous and varied. The Styrian method of decarburization in the open-hearth finery, whereby a material called raw steel is produced, was once of very considerable importance, but is now little used. The method of decarburizing pig-iron by puddling, which is similar in principle to the ordinary puddling process used for converting pig-into wrought-iron, is also somewhat extensively employed, especially on the continent of Europe, the product being called puddled steel, this being drawn into bars, which are cut up and remelted, as is done with blister-steel in manufacturing cast-steel. There are various methods for producing steel by fusing pig-iron with iron ores, or with wrought-iron, or with both together. The Uchatius process belongs to this class of processes, but is of comparatively small importance; but the processes known as the 'Siemens,' the 'Martin,' and the 'Siemens-Martin' are extensively employed. The steel made by any of these processes is generally called open-hearth steel, as the work of decarburizing the pig is done in the open-hearth regenerative furnace. The difference between these processes is simply that in the first-named the pig-iron is treated with certain iron ores without the addition of wrought-iron (scrap-iron); in the second the pig is melted with scrap-iron; and in the third both scrap and pig-iron are used together; hence the names by which the first two of these modifications of what is essentially the same process are known—pig-and-ore, pig-and-scrap—the third, or the 'Siemens-Martin,' being the most commonly employed. By far the most important of all steel-producing processes, if only the amount of metal produced is considered, is the 'pneumatic' or 'Bessemer' process, invented by Sir Henry Bessemer about 1856, which consists in blowing air through molten pig-iron in a 'converter,' or vessel of iron lined with a refractory material—the oxidation of the carbon and silicon which the pig contains, together with a small part of the iron itself, furnishing sufficient heat to keep the material in a fluid state while the operation of decarburization goes on. After complete decarburization of the iron, a certain amount of carbon is restored to the metal by the introduction of spiegeleisen or ferromanganese; this extremely important addition to the Bessemer process, without which it would hardly have been a success, was contributed by R. F. Mushet. The Bessemer process, as conducted in a converter lined with the ordinary silicious or 'acid' material, is suited only for working iron which is practically free from phosphorus and sulphur, or such as is made from ore like that of Lake Superior, from which all, or nearly all, the Bessemer steel made in the United States is manufactured. By the so-called 'basic' or 'Thomas-Gilchrist' process, the converter having a basic (calcined dolomite) lining, iron containing a considerable amount of phosphorus is treated, and a fair quality of steel produced, the phosphorus passing into the slag during the operation, as is the case in puddling. The metal produced by the Bessemer process is generally called Bessemer steel, but some consider it more correct to call it ingot-iron. It can be produced of various grades by varying the amount of carbon which it contains, and is a material of the highest value for structural purposes—as being cheaper, and having more durability, than wrought-iron made by puddling—although of no value for the purposes for which the older higher-class steels are employed. Its principal use is for rails, and during the past few years from seventy to eighty per cent. of the Bessemer steel made in the United States has been used for that purpose.

Gold, ne seolver, ne iren, ne stel. Ancren Riwle, p. 160.

The day,
Descending, struck athwart the hall, and shot
A flying splendour out of brass and steel.

Tennyson, Princess, vi.

A single span of the Forth Bridge is nearly as long as two Eiffel Towers turned horizontally and tied together in the middle, and the whole forms a complicated steel structure weighing 15,000 tons, erected without the possibility of any intermediate support, the lace-like fabric of the bridge soaring as high as the top of St. Paul's. The steel of which the compression members of the structure are composed contains 3% of carbon and 3% of manganese. The parts subjected to extension do not contain more than 1% of carbon.

W. C. Roberts-Austen, Nature, XII. 36.

2. Something made of steel. Specifically—(a) A cutting or piercing weapon; especially, a sword. Compare cold steel, below.

Shall I Sir Pandarus of Troy become,

And by my side wear steel?

Shak., M. W. of W., i. 3. 83.

(b) A piece of steel for striking sparks from flint to ignite tinder or match. (c) A mirror.

We spake of armour.

She straight replies, Send in your steel combs, with

The steel you see your faces in.

Cartwright's Lady Errant (1651). (Nares.)

(d) A cylindrical or slightly tapering rod of steel, sometimes having fine parallel longitudinal lines, used for sharpening carving-knives, etc. (e) A strip of steel used to stiffen a corset, or to expand a woman's skirt.—Beard steel, steel made by adding hydrogen gas to the air-blast in the Bessemer process, to remove arsenic, sulphur, and phosphorus.—Bessemer steel, steel made by the Bessemer process. See def. 1.—Blistered steel. Same as blister-steel.—Carbon steel, ordinary steel; not 'special steel,' but steel in which carbon is clearly the element which gives the iron those peculiar properties which justify its designation by the term steel.—Chrome steel, steel alloyed with a small amount of chromium. Various alloys called by the name of chrome or chromium steel have been introduced, but none have come into general use. They are said to be hard and malleable, and to possess great strength, but to oxidize on exposure more readily than ordinary steel.—Cold steel, a cutting and thrusting weapon; a weapon or weapons for close quarters, as distinguished from firearms.—Compressed steel, steel which is made more dense, tenacious, and free from blow-holes by being condensed by pressure while in a fluid state. This pressure is produced in various ways, as by hydraulic machinery, by steam, by centrifugal force, by the use of liquefied carbonic acid, etc.—Crinoline-steels. See crinoline.—Crucible steel. Same as cast-steel.—Damask steel. See damask.—Garb of steel. See garb.—German steel, steel from Germany. The phrase has now no definite meaning other than geographical. It formerly meant steel made in the finery from spathic ore.—Homogeneous steel. Same as cast-steel.—Indian steel. Same as wootz.—Manganese steel, a variety of special steel made by the addition of manganese, which element is present in various manganese steels which have been analyzed in quantity ranging from less than 1 per cent. to over 21 per cent. The qualities vary greatly with its composition.—Mask of steel. See mask.—Mild steel, steel containing a small amount of carbon (Bessemer steel is frequently so designated); a metal which has some of the qualities of steel, but does not admit of being tempered, or only imperfectly so. See def. 1.—Native steel, the name sometimes given to small masses or buttons of steel, steely iron, or iron which has occasionally been formed by the ignition of coal-seams adjacent to deposits of iron ore.—Nickel steel, a variety of special steel recently introduced, and thought by some to surpass the best carbon steel in certain important respects. It has not yet been sufficiently tried to justify a decided statement as to its value. The high price of nickel, and the small likelihood of any considerable reduction in the price of this metal, would seem to bear heavily against the chances of the general introduction of an alloy of which it should form any considerable part.—Run steel, a trade-mark name (in England) of various small articles, such as bridge-bits and stirrups, made of cast-iron which has been to a certain extent rendered malleable by partial decarburization by cementation. The method is one which has been long known, but which has not come into extensive use till comparatively modern times. Also called malleable cast-iron.—Silicon steel, a variety of special steel which has been experimented with to some extent, but which has not yet become of importance.—Special steel, steel in which the element which gives the iron its peculiar qualities, or what distinguishes it from iron, is not carbon, but some other substance. The principal special steels are chrome, manganese, nickel, silicon, titanium, and tungsten steels, all of which have been much experimented with in recent years. While some authorities appear to maintain that the carbon in special steels is so overpowered by the special element used that its effects are entirely neutralized, others believe that some carbon is absolutely necessary that iron may become converted into what can properly be called steel.—Styrian special steel, steel from Styria; steel made by the Styrian process, which closely resembles the Styrian process of making malleable iron in the finery.—Tungsten steel, a variety of special steel, now largely employed in the manufacture of the harder grades of crucible steel. 'Mushet's,' 'special,' 'imperial,' and 'crucible-hardened' are brands of tungsten steel now sold in the American markets. Steel may contain a much larger proportion of tungsten than it can of carbon without losing its power of being forged. In a table of thirteen analyses of tungsten steel given by H. M. Howe in his 'Metallurgy of Steel' (1891), the tungsten ranges from 1.94 to 11.03 per cent.; the carbon, from 0.38 to 2.15; the manganese, from a trace to 2.66; the silicon, from .05 to .32. Tungsten steel is exceedingly hard and very brittle; it is used chiefly for the tools of lathes and planers designed for heavy work.

II. a. 1. Made of steel: as, a steel plate or buckle.

The average strength [of the Bessemer steel used in building the Forth Bridge] is one-half greater than that of the best wrought iron, and the ductility of the steel plates is fully three times that of corresponding iron plates.

Sir John Fowler and Benjamin Baker, Nineteenth Century, July, 1889, p. 39.

2. Hard as steel; inflexible; unyielding.

Prison my heart in thy steel bosom's ward.

Shak., Sonnets, cxxxi.

Smart as a steel trap. See smart.—Steel bonnet, a head-piece made of a Scotch bonnet lined with steel, as with a skeleton cap. Compare secret, 9.—Steel bronze.

large ears, and no false hoofs. It is of a general reddish-brown color, white below. The gray steenbok is N. melanotis. N. oreotragus is the klip-springer (which see, with cut). Also steenbok, steinbok. Compare steinbok and stonebuck.

steening (stē'ning), n. [Also steuning; verbal n. of *steen*¹, v.] 1. Any kind of path or road paved with small round stones. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. In arch., the brick or stone wall or lining of a well or cesspool, the use of which is to prevent the irruption of the surrounding soil. Also steuning.

steenkirk (stēn'kērk), n. [Also, less prop., stein-kirk; so called in allusion to the battle fought in 1692 near Steenkerke, F. Steinkerque (lit. 'stone church'), a town in Belgium.] A name brought into fashion, after the battle of Steenkirk, for several articles, especially of dress, as wigs, buckles, large neckties, and powder; especially, a cravat of fine lace, loosely and negligently knotted, with long hanging ends, one of which was often passed through a buttonhole.

Mrs. Catton. I hope your Lordship is pleased with your Steenkirk.

Lord F. In love with it, stam my vitals! Bring your Bill; you shall be paid to-morrow. Vanbrugh, The Relapse, I. 3.

I had yielded up my cravat (a smart Steenkirk, by the way, and richly laced). Scott, Rob Roy, xxxi.

Ladies also wore them [neckcloths], as in "The Careless Husband" Lady Easy takes her Steenkirk from her Neck and lays it gently over her Head.

Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 148.

steenstrupine (stēn'strup-in), n. [Named after K. J. V. Steenstrup, a Danish naturalist.] A rare mineral occurring in massive forms and rhombohedral crystals of a brown color in the sodalite syenite of Greenland. It is a silicate of the rare metals of the cerium group, also thorium, and other elements.

steep¹ (stēp), a. and n. [*< ME. stepe, step, stēp, steep, < AS. stēap, steep, high, = OFries. stāp, steep; cf. Icel. steyptir, steep, lofty; Norw. stup, a steep cliff; akin to stoop: see stoop*¹, and *cf. steep*², *steep*².] I. a. 1. Having an almost perpendicular slope; precipitous; sheer.

Two of these Ilands are steep and upright as any wall, that it is not possible to climb them.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 748.

Thus far our ascent was easy; but now it began to grow more steep, and difficult.

Maunderell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 119.

2t. Elevated; high; lofty.

To a room they came,
Steep and of state. Chapman. (Imp. Dict.)

3. Excessive; difficult; forbidding; as, a steep undertaking; a steep price. [Colloq.]

Perhaps if we should meet Shakspeare we should not be conscious of any steep inferiority.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 302.

Neither priest nor squire was able to establish any steep difference in outward advantages between himself and the commons among whom he lived. Fronda, Sketches, p. 164.

4t. Bright; glittering; fiery.

His eye steep and rollyng in his heede.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 201.

His Ene [eyes] leuenaund with light as a low fyn,
With strems [gleams] full stithe in his stepe loke.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 7724.

II. n. A steep or precipitous place; an abrupt ascent or descent; a precipice.

Suddenly a splendor like the morn
Pervaded all the beetling gloomy steeps.
Keats, Hyperion, ii.

Yet up the radiant steeps that I survey Death never climbed. Bryant, To the Apennines.

steep² (stēp), v. [*< ME. steppen, < Icel. steypa, cast down, overturn, pour out, cast (metals), refl. tumble down, = Sw. stōpa = Dan. stōbe, cast (metals), steep (corn); causal of Icel. stūpa = Sw. stupa, fall, stoop: see stoop*¹, and *cf. steep*¹.] I. trans. 1. To tilt (a barrel). Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To soak in a liquid; macerate: as, to steep barley; to steep herbs.

A day afore her [almonds] setting, hem to stepe
In meeth is good.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

The Gordons good, in English blood Battle of Otterbourne (Child's Ballads, VII. 24).

The prudent Sibyl had before prepared
A sop in honey steeped to charm the guard.
Dryden, Æneid, vi. 567.

3. To bathe with a liquid; wet; moisten.

Then she with liquors strong his eies did steep,
That nothing should him hastily awake.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 18.

His coursers, steep'd in sweat and stain'd with gore,
The Greeks' preserver, great Machaon, bore.
Pope, Iliad, xi. 728.

4. To imbue or impregnate as with a specified influence; cause to become permeated or pervaded (with): followed by in.

Is this a time to steep
Thy brains in wasteful slumbers?
Quarles, Emblems, i. 7.
Thou art so steep'd in misery,
Surely 'twere better not to be.
Tennyson, The Two Voices.

The habitual criminal, steeped in vice and used to ignominy, cares very little for disgrace, and accepts punishment as an incident in his career.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLVII. 594.

II. intrans. To be bathed in a liquid; soak.

And now the midnight draught of sleep,
Where wine and spices richly steep,
In massive bowl of silver deep,
The page presents on knee.

Scott, Marmion, i. 30.

steep² (stēp), n. [*< steep*², v.] 1. The process of steeping; the state of being steeped, soaked, or permeated: used chiefly in the phrase in steep.

Strait to each house she hasted, and sweet sleepe Pour'd on each wooer; which so laid in steep.
Their drowsie temples that each brow did nod.

Chapman, Odyssey, ii. 578.

Whilst the barley is in steep it is gauged by the excise officers, to prevent fraud.

Encyc. Brit., IV. 267.

2. That in which anything is steeped; specifically, a fertilizing liquid in which seeds are soaked to quicken germination.

When taken from the white bath, the skins, after washing in water, are allowed to ferment in a bran steep for some time in order to extract a considerable portion of the alum and salt.

C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 665.

3. Rennet: so called from being steeped before it is used. [Prov. Eng.]—Rot's steep, in bleaching cotton goods, the process of thoroughly saturating the cloth. The name is due to the former practice of allowing the flour or size with which the goods were impregnated to ferment and putrefy. Also called wetting-out steep.

steep-down (stēp'doun), a. Having a sheer descent; precipitous.

Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire!
Shak., Othello, v. 2. 280.

You see Him till into the steep-down West
He throws his course. J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 14.

steepen (stē'pn), v. i. [*< steep*¹ + -en.] To become steep.

As the way steepened, . . . I could detect in the hollow of the hill some traces of the old path.

Hugh Miller. (Imp. Dict.)

steeper (stē'pēr), n. [*< steep*² + -er.] A vessel, vat, or cistern in which things are steeped; specifically, a vat in which the indigo-plant is steeped to macerate it before it is soaked in the beating-vat.

steepful (stēp'fūl), a. [*< steep*¹ + -ful.] Steep; precipitous.

Anon he stalks about a steepful Rock,
Where som, to shun Death's (never shunned) stroak,
Had clambred vp.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

steep-grass (stēp'grās), n. The butterwort, Pinguicula vulgaris: so called because used like rennet. Also steepweed, steepwort. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names.

steepiness (stē'pi-nes), n. The state or quality of being steepy or steep; steepness. [Rare.]

The cragginess and steepiness of places up and down . . . makes them inaccessible. Hovell, Forreine Travell, p. 132.

steep (stē'pl), n. [*< ME. steple, steple, stepille, stepul, < AS. stēpel, stēpel, a steep, < stēap, steep, high: see steep*¹.] 1. A typically lofty structure attached to a church, town-house, or other public edifice, and generally intended to contain the bells of such edifice. Steeple is a general term applied to every secondary structure of this description, whether in the form of a simple tower, or, as is usual, of a tower surmounted by a spire.

Ydeleblisse is the grete wynd that thrauth doun the grete tours and the hege steeples and the grete beches ine wodes thrauth to ground.

Ayenbite of Inwyrt (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

Lod. What does he th middle looke like?
Asto. Troth, like a spire steep in a Country Village ouer-peering so many thatcht houses.

Dekker and Middleton, Honest Whore, ii. 1.

At Paris all steeples are claugouring not for sermon.

Carlyle, French Rev., III. i. 4.

2. A lofty head-dress worn by women in the fourteenth century. See hennin.

Some of the more popular of these strange varieties of head-gear have been distinguished as the "horned," the "mitre," the "steep"—in France known as the "hennin"—and the "butterfly."

Encyc. Brit., VI. 469.

3. A pyramidal pile or stack of fish set to dry. Also called pack. See the quotation under *pack*¹, 10 (b).

steepbush (stē'pl-būsh), n. The hardhack; also, Spiræa salicifolia. See Spiræa.

steepchase (stē'pl-chās), n. A horse-race across a tract of country in which ditches, hedges, and other obstacles must be jumped as they come in the way. The name is supposed to be originally due to any conspicuous object, such as a church-steeple, having been chosen as a goal, toward which those taking part in the race were allowed to take any course they chose. The limits of the steepchase-course are now marked out by flags.

steepchaser (stē'pl-chā'sēr), n. 1. One who rides in steepchases.—2. A horse running or trained to run in a steepchase.

"If you do not like hunting, you are to affect to," says Mamma. "You must listen to Captain Breakneck's stories at dinner, laugh in the right places, and ask intelligent questions about his steepchasers."

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 780.

steepchasing (stē'pl-chā'sing), n. [< steepchase + -ing.] The act or sport of riding in a steepchase.

steep-crown (stē'pl-kroun), n. A steep-crowned hat.

And on their heads old steep-crowns.
Hudibras Redivivus (1706). (Nares.)

steep-crowned (stē'pl-kround), a. Having a high peaked crown resembling a steeple: noting various articles of head-gear.

The women wearing the old country steep-crowned hat and simply made gowns.

Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 138.

steeped (stē'pld), a. [< steep + -ed.] 1. Furnished or adorned with a steeple or steeples.

As we neared the provincial city [Worcester], we saw the steeped mass of the cathedral, long and high, rise far into the cloud-freckled blue. H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 44.

2. Having the form of a steeple; peaked; towering.

Steeped hattes.
Wright, Passions of the Mind (ed. 1621), p. 330. (Hallivell.)

A steeped turbant on her head she wore. Fairfax.

steep-engine (stē'pl-en'jin), n. 1. A form of marine steam-engine used on side-wheel boats, in which the working-beam is the highest part, and the connecting-rod is above the crank-shaft.—2. A direct-acting engine in which the crank-shaft is located between the cylinder and the sliding-block or cross-head, the piston-rod is connected with the latter by two branches or limbs which straddle the crank-shaft and crank, and the connecting-rod or pitman plays between the limbs of the piston-rod. It is used for steam-pumps and donkey-engines, being very compact in form.

steep-fair, n. [Supposed to be a corruption, simulating steep (as if 'a church-fair' or 'kermess'), of staple-fair*, < *staple*², market, + *fair*².] A common fair or mart.

These youths, in art, purse, and attire most bare,
Give their attendance at each steep fair;
Being once hir'd he'll not displease his lord.

Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

steep-hat (stē'pl-hat), n. A steep-crowned hat.

An old doublet and a steep hat. Browning, Strafford.

steep-house (stē'pl-hous), n. A church edifice: so called by the early members of the Society of Friends, who maintained that the word church applies properly only to the body of believers.

The reason why I would not go into their steep-house was because I was to bear my testimony against it, and to bring all off from such places to the Spirit of God, that they might know their bodies to be the temples of the Holy Ghost.

George Fox, Journal (Phila.), p. 167.

There are steep-houses on every hand,
And pulpits that bless and ban;
And the Lord will not grudge the single church
That is set apart for man.

Whittier, The Old South.

steep-hunting (stē'pl-hun'ting), n. Same as steepchasing. Carlyle, Sterling, v.

steep-jack (stē'pl-jak), n. A man who climbs steeples and tall chimneys to make repairs, or to erect scaffolding.

steerage (stēr'āj), n. [Early mod. E. also steer-idge, sturage; < steer¹ + -age.] 1. The act, practice, or method of steering; guidance; direction; control; specifically, the direction or control of a ship in her course.

By reason of the evil steerage of the other ship, we had almost broked each other.

[Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 110.]

But he that hath the steerage of my course

Direct my sail!

[Shak., R. and J., i. 4. 112.]

2. That by which a course is steered or directed. [Rare.]

Inscribed to Phœbus, here he hung on high

The steerage [remigium] of his wings.

[Dryden, Æneid, vi. 24.]

3. Naut., the effect of the helm on a ship; the manner in which the ship is affected by the helm: as, she was going nine knots, with easy steerage. — 4. A course steered; a path or way; a course of conduct, or a way of life.

He bore his steerage true in every part,

Led by the compass of a noble heart.

[Webster and Routley, Cure for a Cuckold, iv. 2.]

Let our Governors beware in time, lest . . . they shipwreck themselves, as others have done before them, in the cours wherein God was directing the Steerage to a Free Commonwealth.

[Milton, Free Commonwealth.]

5. A rudder; a helm; apparatus for steering; hence, a place of government or control.

This day the William was held a ground, because she was somewhat leake, and to mend her steerage.

[Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 446.]

While they who at the steerage stood

And reap'd the profit sought his blood.

[Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.]

6. The part of a ship where the tiller traverses; the stern.

I was much surprized, and ran into the steeridge to look on the compass.

[Dampier, Voyages, an. 1688.]

7. In passenger-ships, the part of the ship allotted to the passengers who travel at the cheapest rate, hence called steerage passengers: generally, except in the newest type of passenger-steamers, not in the stern, as might be supposed, but in the bow; in a man-of-war, the part of the berth-deck just forward of the ward-room: it is generally divided into two apartments, one on each side, called the starboard and port steerages, which are assigned to midshipmen, clerks, and others.

It being necessary for me to observe strict economy, I took my passage in the steerage.

[Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xvii.]

Steerage country (naut.), See country.

steerer (stēr'ēr), n. [< steer¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which steers; a steersman.

And I will be the steerer o' t,

To row you o'er the sea,

[Young Bekie (Child's Ballads, IV, 13).]

2. In a tricycle, the rod and small wheel by which the machine is turned about and guided: called front steerer or back steerer according to its place on the machine. — 3. In bunko swindling, one who steers or leads his victim to the rendezvous; a bunko-steerer. [Slang.] — Boat-steerer, in whaling, the second man in rank in a boat's crew, whose duty it is to act as bow-earman while going on to the whale, to harpoon or bomb the whale if he is so instructed by the officer, and to steer the boat after the whale has been struck, having shifted ends with the officer. The duties of the boat-steerer, or harpooner or slewer as he is also called, are the most important intrusted to the crew.

steering-compass (stēr'ing-kum'pās), n. See compass.

steering-gear (stēr'ing-gēr), n. Naut., the machinery by which the rudder is managed. In large ships steam-power has come into very general use for this purpose—a wheel, turned by the helmsman in the same manner as when steering by hand, by its action admitting steam to the engines which move the helm.

steering-sail (stēr'ing-sāl), n. Same as stud-dingsail.

steering-wheel (stēr'ing-hwēl), n. The wheel by which the rudder of a ship is shifted and the ship steered.

steerless¹ (stēr'les), a. [< ME. steresles, < AS. stēorles, having no rudder, < stēor, a rudder, + -less, E. -less; < steer¹, n., + -less.] Having no rudder.

Al sterless withinne a boot am I.

[Chaucer, Troilus, i. 416.]

Like to the sterless boat that swerves with every wind.

[Surrey, Eccl. iii.]

steeve (stēv), n. [< steeve, v.] A long derrick or spar, with a block at one end, used in stowing cargo. Hamersly, Naval Encyc., p. 777.

stevely (stēv'li), adv. [< steeve + -ly.] Firmly; stoutly. Jamieson. Also stievely. [Scotch.]

steaving (stēv'ing), n. [Verbal n. of steeve.] Naut., the angle of elevation which a ship's bowsprit makes with the horizon; a steeve.

steaving (stēv'ing), n. [Verbal n. of steeve, v.] The operation of stowing certain kinds of cargo, as cotton, wool, or hides, in a vessel's hold with a steeve or a jack-screw. See steeve, v. t., 2.

steg (steg), n. Same as stag (in various senses). [Prov. Eng.]

steganographist (steg-a-nog'ra-fist), n. [< steganograph-y + -ist.] One who practises the art of writing in cipher. Bailey, 1727.

steganography (steg-a-nog'ra-fi), n. [= F. steganographie, < Gr. stēganō, covered (< stēganō, cover), + γραφειν, write, mark.] The art of writing in cipher, or in characters which are not intelligible except to the persons who correspond with each other; cryptography. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 498.

The Art of Stenographie, . . . whereunto is annexed a very easie Direction for Steganographie, or Secret Writing, printed at London in 1602 for Cuthbert Burbie.

Title, quoted in Encyc. Brit., XXI. 836, note.

Steganophthalmata (steg'a-nof-thal'ma-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of steganophthalmatus;

see steganophthalmatus.] The covered-eyed aculephs, a division containing those jelly-fishes whose sensory tentaculicysts are covered with flaps or lappets proceeding from the margin of the disk: contrasted with Gymnophthalmata. This division contains some of the commonest jellyfishes, as Aurelia aurita; it corresponds to Discophora in a usual sense, more exactly to Discophora phanerocarpa, or Scyphomedusa. Also called Stenophthalmata. See also cut under Aurelia.

steganophthalmate (steg'a-nof-thal'māt), a. and n. [*< NL. steganophthalmatus, < Gr. stēganōs, covered, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] 1. a. Covered-eyed or hidden-eyed, as a hydromedusa; not gymnophthalmate. Also steganophthalmatus, steganophthalmic, steganophthalmous.

II. n. A member of the Steganophthalmata.

steganophthalmatus (steg'a-nof-thal'māt-us), a. [*< NL. steganophthalmatus; see steganophthalmate.] Same as steganophthalmate.

Steganophthalmia (steg'a-nof-thal'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. stēganōs, covered, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] Same as Steganophthalmata.

steganophthalmic (steg'a-nof-thal'mik), a. [< steganophthalmate + -ic.] Same as steganophthalmate.

steganophthalmous (steg'a-nof-thal'mus), a. [< Gr. stēganōs, covered, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] Same as steganophthalmate.

steganopod (steg-a-nō-pod), a. and n. [< NL. steganopus (-pod), < Gr. stēganōpus (-pod), web-footed, < stēganōs, covered, + πους (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. a. In ornith., having all four toes webbed; totipalmate.

II. n. A member of the Steganopodes.

Steganopoda (steg-a-nōp'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL.; see steganopod.] An Aristotelian group of birds, approximately equivalent to the Linnean Anseres, or web-footed birds collectively.

steganopodan (steg-a-nōp'ō-dan), a. [< steganopod + -an.] In ornith., totipalmate; steganopod.

Steganopodes (steg-a-nōp'ō-dēz), n. pl. [NL.; see steganopod.] An order of natatorial birds, consisting of those which have all four toes webbed and a more or less developed gular pouch; the Totipalmata. It is now usually divided into six families, Sulidae, Pelecanidae, Phalacrocoracidae, Platidae, Tachypetidae, and Phaethonidae, respectively represented by the gannets, pelicans, cormorants, darters, frigates, and tropic-birds. Dysporomorphæ, Pinnipedes, and Piscatores are synonyms. See cuts under anhinga, cormorant, trigade bird, gannet, pelican, Phaethon, rough-billed, and totipalmate.

steganopodous (steg-a-nōp'ō-dus), a. [< steganopod + -ous.] Same as steganopod.

Steganopus (steg-a-nōp'ō-pus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1815): see steganopod.] A genus of phalaropes, having the toes margined with an even membrane, and the bill very long and slender.

It includes Wilson's phalarope, S. adsoni, a North American species, the largest and handsomest of the family. This genus has nothing to do with the order of birds that appears, from the term Steganopodes, to be named from it.

Stegocarpi (steg-ō-kār'pī), n. pl. [NL.; see stegocarpaceus.] A division of bryaceous mosses in which the capsule opens in the upper part by a deciduous lid or operculum. It embraces the larger part of the true mosses.

stegocarpaceus (steg-ō-kār'pus), a. [*< NL. stegocarpaceus, < Gr. stēganōs, cover, + καρπος, fruit.]

In bot., of or belonging to the Stegocarpi; having an operculate capsule.

Under view of a segment of the disk of Aurelia aurita; m, a little cyst with its protective hood, a usual character of Steganophthalmata; the arrangement of the radiating canals, the aperture of a genital chamber, with placated genital membrane.

Wilson's Phalarope, Steganopus adsoni.

It includes Wilson's phalarope, S. adsoni, a North American species, the largest and handsomest of the family. This genus has nothing to do with the order of birds that appears, from the term Steganopodes, to be named from it.

Stegocarpus (steg-ō-kār'pī), n. pl. [NL.; see stegocarpaceus.] A division of bryaceous mosses in which the capsule opens in the upper part by a deciduous lid or operculum. It embraces the larger part of the true mosses.

stegocarpaceus (steg-ō-kār'pus), a. [*< NL. stegocarpaceus, < Gr. stēganōs, cover, + καρπος, fruit.]

In bot., of or belonging to the Stegocarpi; having an operculate capsule.

Stegocephala (steg-ō-sef'a-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stegocephalus; see stegocephalous.] Same as Labyrinthodontia. Also Stegocephali.

stegocephalian (steg-ō-sef'a-li-an), a. and n. [< Stegocephala + -ian.] 1. a. Stegocephalous.

II. n. A member of the Stegocephala.

stegocephalous (steg-ō-sef'a-lus), a. [*< NL. stegocephalus, < Gr. stēgēin, cover, + κεφαλή, the head.] Having the head mailed, loricate, or cataphracted, as a labyrinthodont; having the characters of, or pertaining to, the Stegocephala.

Stegodon (steg'ō-don), n. [NL. (Falconer, 1857), < Gr. stēgēin, cover, + ὄδον (odon-) = E. tooth.] 1. A genus of fossil elephants of the Tertiaries of India, intermediate in their dental characters between the existing elephants and the mastodons. They are, however, most nearly related to the former, belonging to the same subfamily, Elephantinae. S. insignis is an example.

2. [l. c.] An elephant of this genus.

stegognathous (steg-ō-nā-thus), a. [< Gr. stēgēin, cover, + γνάθος, jaw.] In conch., having a jaw composed of imbricated plates; noting the Bulimulidae.

Stegoptera (ste-gop'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stegopterus*; see stegopterous.] An order of neuropterous insects; the roof-winged insects. It included the Panorpidæ or scorpion-flies, the Rhaphididæ or snake-flies, the Manisidæ or mantis-flies, the Myrmeleontidæ or ant-lions, the Hemerobidæ or lacewings, the Stalidæ or May-flies, and the Phryganeidæ or caddis-flies. The order is now broken up.

stegopterous (ste-gop'te-rus), a. [*< NL. stegopterus, < Gr. stēgēin, cover, + πτερόν, wing, = E. feather.] In entom., roof-winged; holding the wings deflexed when at rest; of or pertaining to the Stegoptera.

Stegosauria (steg-ō-sā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. stēgēin, cover, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] An order or suborder of dinosaurs, represented by the families Stegosauridæ and Scelidosauridæ.

stegosaurian (steg-ō-sā'ri-an), a. and n. [< Stegosauria + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Stegosauria, or having their characters.

II. n. A dinosaur of the order Stegosauria.

Stegosauridæ (steg-ō-sā'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stegosaurus + -idæ.] A family of herbivorous dinosaurs, typified by the genus Stegosaurus, with biconcave vertebrae, ischia retrorse, and meeting in mid-line, the astragalus coalesced with the tibia, and the metatarsals short. They were Jurassic reptiles of great size.

stegosauroid (steg-ō-sā'roid), n. and a. [< Stegosaurus + -oid.] Same as stegosaurian.

Stegosaurus (steg-ō-sā'rus), n. [NL. (Marsh, 1877), < Gr. stēgēin, cover, + σαῦρος, a lizard.]

1. The typical genus of Stegosauridæ. It contained species some 30 feet long, mailed with enormous bucklers and spines.—2. [l. c.] A dinosaur of this genus.

steik, v. t. See steek.

steill, n. An obsolete Scotch spelling of stail.

steint, v. and n. An obsolete Scotch spelling of steint, stent.

Steinberger (stin'bēr-gēr), n. A white wine grown on the Rhine, near Wiesbaden in Prussia. The vineyard belongs to the Prussian national domain. Steinberger ranks in estimation second only to the Johannisberger, and in some years is considered better by connoisseurs.

steinbock (stin'bok), n. [< Gr. see steenbok.] 1. The ibex.—2. Same as steinbok.

Steinerian (sti-nē'ri-an), a. and n. [Named by Cremona from Steiner (see def.).] 1. a. Pertaining to the discoveries of the German geometer Jacob Steiner (1796–1863).—Steinerian polygon. See polygon.

II. n. In math., the locus of points whose first polars with respect to a given curve have double points.

Steiner's surface. See surface.

steing, n. Same as sting.

steinheilite (stin'hī-lit), n. A variety of iolite.

steining (sti'ning), n. Same as steening, 2.

Steinitz gambit. See gambit.

steinkirk (stin'kērk), n. See steenkirck.

steinmannite (stin'man-it), n. [Named after Steinmann, a German mineralogist.] A variety of galena containing some arsenic and antimony. It commonly occurs in octahedral crystals.

steirk, n. See stirk. steive, v. A variant of stive.

steket, v. An obsolete form of stick.

stelt. An obsolete form of steal, steal, stale, etc.

stela (stē'lā), n. Same as stela.

stela, n. An old spelling of steal, steal.

stela, n. An obsolete form of stale.

Stellwag's symptom. See symptom.
Stelmatopoda (stel-ma-top'ō-dä), n. pl. A division of Polyzoa or Bryozoa, corresponding to the Gymnolæmata: contrasted with Lophopoda.

monly diffuse herbs, with weak, smooth, or hairy stems, loosely ascending or growing in matted tufts. Their flowers are usually white, and form terminal paniced cymes, sometimes mixed with leaves. Several species are known as chickweed, and several others as starwort or stitchwort, especially S. holostea (see stitchwort), a common English species, bearing such local names as albone, break-bones, shirt-buttons, snap-jack. S. longifolia, the long-leaved stitchwort, frequent in the Northern Atlantic States, forms delicate tangled masses of light green overtopped by numerous small white flowers. S. pubera, the great chickweed or starwort, the most showy Atlantic species, forms conspicuous dark-green tufts along shaded banks in earliest spring, from Pennsylvania southward. See also cut under ovary.

stellar (stel'a-ri), a. Same as stellar.

stellate (stel'ät), a. and n. [L. stellatus, pp. of stellare, set or cover with stars, < stella, star: see STELLA.] 1. a. Star-like in form; star-shaped; arranged in the form of a conventional star; radiating from a common center like the rays or points of a star: as, stellate leaves; the stellate groups of natrolite crystals.— Stellate bristle or hair, a bristle or hair which branches at the end in a star-shaped manner. See cut under hair, 4.— Stellate fracture, a fracture, occurring usually in a flat bone, in which several fissures radiate from a central point of injury.— Stellate leaves, leaves more than two in number, surrounding the stem in a whorl, or radiating like the spokes of a wheel or the points of a star. Also called verticillate leaves. See cut under pipsissewa.— Stellate ligament, a costovertebral ligament; the anterior costocentral ligament uniting the head of a rib with the body of a vertebra: so called from the radiated figure in man.— Stellate spicule, an aster; a stellate.— Stellate veins, very minute venous radicles situated just under the capsule of the kidney, arranged in a radiating or stellate manner.

II. n. A stellate microsclere, or flesh-spicule in the form of a star. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

stellated (stel'a-ted), a. [< stellate + -ed²]. Same as stellate. -Stellated polygon, polyhedron, etc. See the nouns.

stellately (stel'āt-li), adv. Radiately; like a star; in a stellate manner.

stellate-pilose (stel'ât-pī'lōs), a. In bot., pilose with stellate hairs.

stellation† (ste-lā'shon), n. [< ML. stellatio(n) (?), < L. stella, a star: see stellate.] 1. The act or process of becoming a star or a constellation.

The skaly Scorpion's fixt amongst the rest, . . .
The cause of it's stellation to enquire,
And why so beautify'd with heavenly fire,
Comes next in course.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 138.

2. Same as constellation.

Stars, and stellations of the heavens.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 4.

stellature (stel'ā-tūr), n. [< ML. stellatura*, irreg. taken as equiv. to stellionatus: see stellionate.] Same as stellionate.

Extortion and cozenage is proverbially called crimen stellionatus, the sin of stellature.

stelled† (sted), p. a. [Pp. of stell: see stell, and cf. stalled, pp. of stall.] Fixed.

The sea, with such a storm as his bare head
In hell-black night endured, would have buoy'd up.

And quench'd the stelled fires. Shak., Lear, iii. 7. 61.
[Some commentators define the word as 'stellated,' stelleert, stelleeret, n. [See *steelyard*².] Same as *steelyard*². Cotgrave.
'starry.']

Stelleria (ste-lé'ri-ä), n. [NL., named after G. W. Steller: see stellerine.] In ornith., a genus of sea-ducks, the type of which is Steller's eider, S. dispar, usually called Polysticta stelleri. Bonaparte, 1838.

Stellerida (ste-ler'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., prop. Stellarida, < stellaris, starry, + -ida.] A class or other large group of echinoderms of obviously radiate figure; the starfishes and brittle-stars: synonymous with Asteroidea. 2.

elaborate sculpture or a painted scene, commonly used among the ancient Greeks as a gravestone. (b) A similar slab or pillar serving as a milestone, to bear an inscription in some public place, or for a like purpose.

stelechite (stel'e-kit), n. [= F. stèlechite, < Gr. στῆλεχος, the crown of the root of a tree, stump, block, log, the trunk, + *-ite*².] A fine kind of storax, in larger pieces than the calamite. Also, erroneously, stelocheite.

Stelgidopteryx (stel-jid-op'te-riks), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. στέλις (steliys), a scraper, + πτερυξ, a wing.] A genus of Hirundinidae, having the outer web of the first primary serrate by conversion of the barbs into a series of recurved hooks; the rough-winged swallows. S. serrispennis is the common rough-winged swallow of the United States, of plain brownish coloration, greatly resembling the bank-swallow. Several others inhabit Central and South America. See cut under rough-winged.

stell (stel), v. t. [< ME. stellen, < AS. stellan (= MD. D. MLG. LG. OHG. MHG. G. stellen), set up, place, fix, < steall (= MD. D. stal = MLG. stal, LG. stall = OHG. MHG. stal, G. stall), a place, stall: see stall¹] To set; place; fix. [Obsolete or dialectal.] stellar (stel'är), a. [= F. stellaire = Sp. estrelar = It. stellare, < LL. stellaris, pertaining to a star, starry, < L. stella, a star: see stella.] Of or pertaining to stars; astral: as, stellar worlds; stellar space; stellar regions.

Mine eye hath play'd the painter, and hath stell'd

These soft fires
Not only enlighten, but . . . shed down
Their stellar virtue on all kinds that grow.

Milton, P. L., iv. 671.

Stellaria (s-tē-lā-rī-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), name transferred, on account of the star-like blossoms, from a Corispermum so named by Willd. (c. 1719); < L. stella, a star.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllales, and of the Malvaceae. It is characterized by the corolla of five or six flowers usually with five deeply to four-lobed petals and five styles, and by a contracted globose or globose-ovoid ovary which commonly splits into three two-cleft or completely parted valves. There are about 90 species, mostly of the high northern and in the tropics they occur only in the mountains. Seven species occur stelochite (stél'ô-kít), n. See steelechite.

stelography (stê-log'ra-fî), n. [< Gr. στήλη, stêlê, a stele (see stêlê), + γράφω, graphô, to write.] The practice of writing or inscribing on steles or pillars.

Jacob's pillar . . . thus engraved . . . gave probably the origin to the invention of stelography.
Stackhouse, Hist. Bible, p. 323.

stem¹ (stem), n. [*< ME. stem, stam, < AS. stemm, stefn, stefn, also stefn (> E. dial. stovin), stem, trunk (of a tree) = D. stam, stem, trunk, stock (of a tree or family) = MLG. stam, stamme, stem, stem (of a tree), trunk, tree, stock, race, = Icel. stofn, stonn, stem, trunk of a tree, = Sw. stam = Dan. stamme (in comp. stam-), stem, trunk, stock (of a tree), stock, race, family (also with some variation of form in a particular sense, 'the prow of a vessel': see stem²); = OIr. tamon, Ir. tamhán (for *stamon), stem, trunk; cf. Gr. στῆλη, an earthen jar; with formative -mn-, < √ sta, stand: see stand. Not related to stuff, except remotely.] 1. The body of a tree, shrub, or plant; the firm part which supports the branches; the stock; the stalk; technically, the ascending axis, which ordinarily grows in an opposite direction to the root or descending axis. The stem is composed of fibrous, spiral, and cellular tissues, arranged in various ways; it typically assumes a cylindrical form and a perpendicular position, and bears upon it the remaining aerial parts of the plant. Its form and direction, however, are subject to much variation in particular cases. In regard to internal structure, there are three principal modifications of stems characteristic of three of the great natural classes into which the vegetable kingdom is divided—namely, exogens, endogens, and acrogens. Stems are herbaceous or woody, solid or hollow, jointed or unjointed, branched or simple. Sometimes they are so weak as to be procumbent, although more generally firm and erect; sometimes weak stems are upheld by twining or by other methods of climbing. In some plants the stem is so short as to seem to be wanting, the leaves and flower-stalks appearing to spring from the top of the root. There are also stems, such as the rhizome and tuber, which, being subterranean, have been mistaken for roots. See cuts under baobab, esparto, internode, pipis-sewa, snake-root, rhizome, and tuber. 2. The stalk which supports the flower or the fruit of a plant; the peduncle of the fructification, or the pedicel of a flower; the petiole or leaf-stem. See cuts under pedicel, peduncle, and petiole.*

Two lovely berries moulded on one stem.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 211.
 For I maun crush among the stoure
 Thy slender stem.
Burns, To a Mountain Daisy.

3. The stock of a family; a race; ancestry.
 Ye may all, that are of noble stem.
Approach, and kiss her sacred vesture's hem.
Milton, Arcades, i. 82.

4. A branch of a family; an offshoot.
 Richard Plantagenet, . . .
 Sweet stem from York's great stock.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 41.

5. Anything resembling the stem of a plant. Specifically—(a) The handle of a tool. Hallivell, (Prov. Eng.) (b) That part of a vase, cup, or goblet which unites the body to the foot or base, in examples where the body is not immediately set upon the latter.

Wine-glasses or goblets are classified by the nature of their stems, or by the nature of their feet.
H. J. Powell, Glass-Making, p. 61.

(c) In type-founding, the thick stroke or body-mark of a roman or italic letter. See cut under type. (d) In a vehicle, a bar to which the bow of a falling hood is hinged. (e) The projecting rod of a reciprocating valve, serving to guide it in its action. See cut under slide-valve. (f) In zoöl. and anat., any slender, especially axial, part like the stem of a plant; a stalk, stipe, rachis, footstalk, etc. (g) In ornith., the whole shaft of a feather. (h) In entom., the base of a clavate antenna, including all the joints except the enlarged outer ones: used especially in descriptions of the Lepidoptera.

6. In musical notation, a vertical line added to the head of certain kinds of notes. Of the kinds of note now in use, all but two, the breve and the semi-breve, have stems. It may be directed either upward or downward, thus, . When two voice-parts are written on the same staff, the stems of the notes belonging to the upper part are often directed upward, and those of the lower part downward, particularly when the parts cross, or both use the same note (see figure). The latter note is said to have a double stem. See *note*¹, 13. Also called tail.

7. In philol., a derivative from a root, having itself inflected forms, whether of declension or of conjugation, made from it; the unchanged part in a series of inflectional forms, from which the forms are viewed as made by additions; base; crude form.—Aerial stem, the above-ground axis of a plant, as opposed to the rootstock or other subterranean form of the stem.—Ancipital, compound, erect, herbaceous, pituitary, secondary, etc., stem. See the adjectives.

stem¹ (stem), v. t.; pret. and pp. stemmed, ppr. stemming. [< stem¹, n.] To remove the stem as; to separate from the stem: as, to stem tobacco.

stem² (stem), n. [*< ME. *stem, stam, < AS. *stenn, stefn, *stefn, also stefna, stefna, the prow of a ship (steorstefn, the poop, lit. 'steer-stem'), = OS. stamm = D. steren = MLG. lat. steven, prow of a ship (> G. steren, stem (corder-steren, 'fore stem,' prow, hinter-steven, 'hind stem,' stern-post)), = Icel. stafn, stamm, also stefni, stemni, stem of a ship (prow or stern) = Dan. stevn, stavn = Sw. stäf, prow (fram-stäm, 'fore stem,' prow, bakstäm, 'back stem,' stem); a particular use, with variations of form, of AS. stenn, stefn, E. stem¹, etc., stem, trunk, post: see stem¹. The naut. use in E. is prob. in part of Scand. origin.] 1. A curved piece of timber or metal to which the two sides of a ship are united at the foremost end. The lower end of it is scarfed or riveted to the keel, and the bowsprit, when present, rests on its upper end. In wooden ships it is frequently called the main stem, to distinguish it from the false stem, or cutwater. The outside of the stem is usually marked with a scale showing the perpendicular height from the keel, for indicating the draft of water forward. See also cut under forecastle.*

Stem and allied parts.
 S, stem; K, keel; A, apron; D, deadwood; SS, stemson; DH, deck-hooks; BH, breast-hooks; ST, stem-piece, or independent piece; MP, main piece, or lace-piece; BP, bowsprit-piece; BWS, bowsprit; G, gripe; F, false keel. The dotted lines show bolts.

Pretious jewels fecht from far

 Plous up huge forrowes in the Terren Maine.
The Taming of the Shrew, p. 22. (Hallivell.)

2. The forward part of a vessel; the bow.
 Turnynge therfore the stemmes of his shypes towarde the Easte, he affirmed that he had founde the Ilande of Ophir.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on [America], ed. Arber, p. 66).

False stem, a stem fitted closely to the forward side of the main stem, generally sharp, and introduced for the purpose of decreasing a vessel's resistance and increasing her speed; a cutwater.—From stem to stern, from one end of the ship to the other, or through the whole length.

They skip
 From stem to stern; the boatswain whistles.
Shak., Pericles, iv. 1. 64.

stem² (stem), v.; pret. and pp. stemmed, ppr. stemming. [< stem², n.] 1. To dash against with the stem (of a vessel).

They stood off again, and returning with a good gale, they stemmed her upon the quarter, and almost overset her.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 226.

2. To keep (a vessel) on its course; steer.
 He is the master of true courage that all the time sedately stems the ship.
Cornelius Nepos in English (1723), Ded. (Encyc. Dict.)

3. To make headway against by sailing or swimming, as a tide or current; hence, in general, to make headway against (opposition of any kind).

The breathless Muse awhile her wearied wings shall ease,
 To get her strength to stem the rough Sabrinian seas.
Drayton, Polyolbion, iii. 434.

II. intrans. 1. To make headway (as a ship); especially, to make progress in opposition to some obstruction, as a current of water or the wind.

They on the trading flood,
 Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape,
 Ply, stemming nightly toward the pole.
Milton, P. L., ii. 642.

2. To head; advance head on.
 At first we could scarce lie S. W., but, being got a degree to the Southward of the Line, the Wind veer'd most Easterly, and then we stemmed S. W. by S.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 79.

stem³ (stem), v. t.; pret. and pp. stemmed, ppr. stemming. [*< ME. stemmen; < Icel. stemma = Sw. stämma = Dan. stemme, stem, = OHG. stenopaic, stenopaic (stēn-ō-pā'ik, -pē'ik), a. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow, + apa-, an opening, + -ia.]

Having a small or narrow opening. Stenopaic slit, a narrow slit in an opaque lamina, placed before an eye to test the degree of its astigmatism by determining the difference of its refraction in different meridians. Stenopaic spectacles, spectacles having an oval metal plate with a small central aperture.

Stenopelmatus (stēn-ō-pel'ma-tus), n. [NL. (Burmeister, 1838), < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + pēlma, the sole of the foot.] A curious genus of Locustidae, containing forms known in the western United States as sand-crickets. They are fierce-looking insects with large head and jaws, and live under stones or in burrows in the sand. They are carnivorous, and in New Mexico are commonly but erroneously reputed to be poisonous. Several species are known in the western Sand-cricket Stenopelmatus truncatus, about half natural size.

United States, of which S. fasciatus is the commonest. The genus is also represented in Mexico, South America, and Australia.

stenopetalous (stēn-ō-pet'a-lus), a. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow, + pētaion, a leaf (petal): see petal.] In bot., having narrow petals: narrow-petaled.

stenophyllous (stēn-ō-fil'us), a. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow-leaved, < stēnos, narrow, close, + phyllos, a leaf.] In bot., having narrow leaves.

Stenopsis (stē-nop'sis), n. [NL. (John Cassin, 1851), < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + opsis, look, appearance.] A genus of South American setirostral goatsuckers, of the family Caprimulgidae, containing numerous species, as S. cayennensis.

Stenorhynchine (stēn'ō-rīng-kī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Stenorhynchus + -ina.] A subfamily of Phocidae, or seals, typified by the genus Stenorhynchus (or Ogmorhinus), the sterrincks. These seals exclusively inhabit southern seas, for Monachus, sometimes considered stenorhynchine, does not belong here. The only genera besides the type are Lobodon, Leptonychotes (or Leptonyx of Gray, not of Swainson), and Ommatophoca. As explained under sea-leopard, the current name is untenable. See cut under sea-leopard.

stenorhynchine (stēn'ō-rīng'kī'n), a. [< Stenorhynchus + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Stenorhynchine.

stenorhynchous (stēn-ō-rīng'kus), a. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow, + pygchos, snout.] In ornith., narrow-billed; having a compressed beak.

Stenorhynchus (stēn-ō-rīng'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + pygchos, snout.] In zool.: (a) A genus of crabs, containing the British spider-crab, S. phalangium: same as Macropodia. Latreille, 1819. (b) A genus of seals. See Stenorhynchine. (c) Curier, 1826. (d) A name of other genera, of birds, reptiles, and insects respectively.

Steno's duct. See Stenson's duct.

stenosed (stē-nōst'), a. [< stenosis + -ed.] Characterized by stenosis; morbidly narrowed.

stenosis (stē-nō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. stēnōsis, a straitening, < stēnoō, make narrow, straiten, < stēnos, narrow, strait, close.] The pathological narrowing of a passage.

Stenostomata (stēn-ō-stō-ma-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + stoma (-), mouth.] A suborder of ctenophorans, containing the saccate, lobate, and tentate comb-jellies, collectively contrasted with the Eurystomata (which see). Most of the comb-bearers belong to this division.

stenostomatous (stēn-ō-stom'a-tus), a. [NL., < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + stoma (-), mouth.] Having a small, narrow, or contracted mouth; not eurystomatous. Also stenostomous.

Stenotaphrum (stēn-ō-taf'rum), n. [NL. (Trinius, 1820), so called in allusion to the alternate notches of the rachis, in which the flowers are embedded; < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + tafros, a ditch or trench.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Panicæ. It is characterized by flowers with only three glumes or with a fourth smaller one the spikelets acute, borne in small fascicles sessile or half-immersed in excavations along a flattened or angled rachis. There are 3 or 4 species, very widely dispersed along sea-shores of tropical regions, and most frequent on the islands of the Indian and South Pacific Oceans. They are creeping grasses sending up short ascending and often compressed branches with spreading, flat, or convolute leaves, and a terminal spike of flowers. S. Americanum, locally known as buffalo-grass, is valued as a means of covering shifting sands with a firm turf, and has proved useful as a fodder-plant, especially on Ascension Island. See St. Augustine grass (under stunt), and cut under petiole.

stenotelegraphy (stēn'ō-tē-leg'ra-fī), n. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow, + E. telegraphy.] A rapid telegraphic transmission of words and sentences by a system of shorthand.

stenoterosus (stē-not'e-rus), a. [< Gr. stēnōteros, compar. of stēnos, narrow, strait, close.] Becoming more and more contracted from the center to the circumference, relatively to the radii represented.—Stenoterosus map-projection. See projection.

stenotic (stē-not'ik), a. [< stenosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of stenosis.

Stenotomus (stē-not'ō-mus), n. [NL. (Gill, 1865), < Gr. stēnos, narrow, + tomos, a cut, slice.] A genus of sparoid fishes, or a section of Diplodus, having the incisor teeth very narrow and entire. The type is S. argyriops, the common scup, scuppaug, or porgy. See cut under scup. stenotype (stēn'ō-tip), n. [< Gr. stēnos, narrow, + typos, type.] An ordinary type-letter—capital, lower-case, or italic—used to denote a shorthand character or outline. J. E. Munson, Dict. of Phonography, Int.

stentotypic (stēn-ō-tip'ik), a. [< stentotype + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stentotype; printed according to the rules of stentotype.

stentotypy (stēn'ō-ti-pi), n. [< stentotype + -y.] A method of representing or describing shorthand characters and outlines by ordinary type-letters. It is used for illustrating phonographic text-books and literature, and also as a system of shorthand for typewriters. Capital letters are used to represent stems; small or lower-case letters stand for adjuncts; and an inverted period shows where a vowel-sound or sign comes in.

Stenson's duct. 1. The duct of the parotid gland (see parotid): so named from Nil Stenson, or Nicolaus Stenonianus, of Copenhagen (1638–86). Also Stenonian duct, Steno's duct.—2. See ducts or canals of Stenson, under duct.

stent¹ (stent), v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of stint.

stent² (stent), v. t. [A var. of stend, ult. of extend, after the noun stent².] 1. To stretch.—2. To straiten.—3. To confine. [Scotch in all senses.]

stent² (stent), n. [A var. of stend, in def. 2 of extent: see stend, n., stent², v., and extent.] 1. A stretcher; a stenter (which see).—2. Extent; limit; in some English mining districts, the limits of a pitch or bargain.

stent³ (stent), n. [Sc. also stant; < ME. stente, extant, taxation, valuation, < ML. extenta, valuation: see extant.] In Scots law, a valuation of property in order to taxation; a taxation; a tax. stent³ (stent), v. t. [< stent³, n.] In Scots law, to assess; tax at a certain rate.

stent⁴ (stent), n. [ME. stent, stopping-place. Cf. Dan. stente, a stile; ult. < stand, v.] A stopping-place.

stent⁵ (stent), n. [Origin obscure.] In mining, same as attle. [Rare, Eng.]

stenter (stēn'tēr), n. [< stent² + -er.] A machine or apparatus for stretching or stentering muslins and other thin fabrics. Also called stenter-hook.

stenter (stēn'tēr), v. t. [< stenter, n.] To operate upon (thin cotton fabrics, as book-muslins, etc.) in a manner to impart to them a so-called elastic finish. This work as originally performed by hand was executed by holding the fabric edge-wise by the selvages, and pulling it backward and forward while it was subjected to the action of heated air. The various modern machines and frames now employed are designed to produce the same effect upon the goods by an analogous movement and treatment in a current of heated air.

stenting (stēn'ting), n. Same as stenton.

stent-master (stēn'mās'tēr), n. A person appointed to allocate the stent or tax on the persons liable. [Scotch.]

stenton (stēn'ton), n. A short heading at right angles to a cross-cut. [North of England coal-fields.]

stentor (stēn'tor), n. [< L. Stentor, < Gr. Stēntōr, a Greek herald in the Trojan war, who, according to Homer, had a voice as loud as that of fifty other men together.] 1. A person having a very powerful voice.

British noises
(For gain, lust, honour, in litigious prose),
Are bellow'd out, and cracke the barbarous voices Of Turkish stentors.

Chapman, Iliad, To the Reader, l. 222.

2. In mammal.: (a) The ursine howler, Myctetes ursinus, a platyrrhine monkey of South America; an alouate; any species of Myctetes. See cut under howler. (b) [cap.] The genus of howlers: same as Myctetes. Geoffroy, 1812.—

3. In Protozoa: (a) A trumpet-animalcule, or so-called funnel-like polyp. (b)

[cap.] The typical genus of Stentoridae, of elongate, trumpet-like, or infundibuliform figure, with rounded peristome. They are of large size, often brilliant color, social habits, and wide distribution; among the longest- and best-known infusorians. They were formerly mistaken for or classed with polyps. S. polymorphus is a leading species; S. niger is another. See also cut under Infusoria.

Stentor polymorphus, twenty times natural size.

stentorian (stēn-tō'ri-an), a. [< Stentor + -ian. Cf. LL. Stentoreus, Stentorian.] 1. Resembling the voice of Stentor (see stentor, etymology); extremely loud or powerful in sound.

They echo forth in stentorian clamours.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 326.

He had a stentorian voice, and thundered it out.

Aubrey, Lives (Ralph Kettle).

2. Able to utter a very loud sound: as, stentorian lungs.

Stentoridae (stēn-tor'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stentor + -idae.] The trumpet-animalcules or funnel-like infusorians, a family of heterotrichous Infusoria, typified by the genus Stentor.

stentorin (stēn-tō-rin), n. [< Stentor + -in.] The blue pigment or coloring matter of infusorians of the genus Stentor. E. R. Lankester, 1873.

stentorine (stēn-tō-rin), a. [< Stentor + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Stentoridae.

stentorinous (stēn-tō'ri-us), a. [< stentor + -ious. Cf. L. Stentoreus, < Gr. Stēntōreios, pertaining to Stentor, < Stēntōr, Stentor.] Stentorian. Fuller, Ch. Hist., X. iv. 61.

stentorophonic (stēn'tō-rō-fon'ik), a. [< Gr. stēntōrophōnos, loud-voiced like Stentor, < Stēntōr, Stentor (see stentor), + phōnē, voice.] Speaking or sounding very loud. S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 252.

stent-roll (stēn'trōl), n. The cess-roll. [Scotch.] Stenus (stē'nus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1796), < Gr. stēnos, narrow, strait.] A large and cosmopolitan genus of coleopterous insects, typical of the old family Stenidae, which is now included in the Staphylinidae. More than 200 species are known, all of small size and active habits, found usually on the banks of streams or ponds.

step (step), v.; pret. and pp. stepped or stept, ppr. stepping. [< (a) ME. steppen, stappen, < AS. steppan, stæppan = OFries. steppa = MD. steppen, stippen, stappen, D. stappen = MLG. stapen = OHG. stephan, stephen, steffen, stepfen, MHG. stepfen, also OHG. staphon, MHG. staphen, staphon, staphon, go. step: secondary forms (in part from the noun) of (b) ME. stapen, *< AS. stapan (not found in the inf., for which appears the form steppan or stæppan, above, which has the same pret. stōp, pp. stapen) = OS. stapan = OFries. stapa = MLG. stapen, go. advance: Teut. √ stap, appearing nasalized in stamp, q. v.; cf. Russ. stopa, footstep, sole of the foot; Skt. √ stambh, prop, make firm; ult. < √ sta, stand: see stand.] 1. intrans. 1. To move the legs and feet as in walking; advance or recede by a movement of the foot or feet: as, to step forward; to step backward; to step up or down.

Alayn, for Goddes banes,

Stepe on thy feet; com out, man, al at anes.

Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 154

He pays you as surely as your feet hit the ground they step on.

Shak., T. N., iii. 4. 306.

Tis done—he steps into the welcome chaise.

Couper, Retirement, l. 391.

2. To go; walk; march; especially, to go a short distance: as, to step to a neighbor's house.

He myghte nother stapen ne studen tyl he a staf hadde.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 403.

into the English language, their prophetic immunity and lawfulness are no longer generally topics or degrees unto the English people. — Ibid., Introduction, p. 534.

Richard is Henry's step-back father.
The Nation, Aug. 23, 1888, p. 153.

stephanic (ste-fan'ik'), a. [Gr. στέφανος, a wreath, crown: see stephanos.] Same as stephanial.

Hera La Favis, wearing stephanic

The arch of the top of the cranium is markedly flat, giving the stephanic region a somewhat angular appearance. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 262.

stephanion (ste-fā-ni-on), n.: pl. stephania (-i). [NL. < Gr. στέφανιον, dim. of στέφανος, a wreath: see stephanos.] In craniom., the point where the coronal suture crosses the temporal ridge. An upper stephanion and a lower are distinguished, corresponding to the upper and lower temporal ridges. See cut under craniometry.

stephanite (ste-fā-nit), n. [Named after Stephan, Archduke of Austria.] A native sulphid of silver and antimony, a mineral of iron-black color and metallic luster. It crystallizes in the orthorhombic system, and is often pseudohexagonal through twinning. Also called black silver or brittle silver ore.

stephanome (ste-fā-nōm), n. [For stephanonome*, < Gr. στέφανος, crown (corona), + μετρίω, take, νόμος, law.] An instrument for measuring the angular dimensions of fog-bows—for example, as observed at mountain observatories. See the quotation.

This instrument, named a stephanome, consists of a graduated bar, at one end of which the eye is placed, and in which slides a cross-bar carrying certain projections. With its aid faint objects, for which a sextant would be useless, may be measured to within 5 minutes. Phil. Mag., 5th ser., XXIX, 454.

Stephanophorus (ste-fā-nōf'ō-rus), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1841), < Gr. στέφανοφορος, < στέφανος, crown, + φέρειν = E. bear.] 1. In ornith., a monotypic Neotropical genus of tanagers, having a short, turgid, almost pyriform bill. S. leucocephalus is bluish-black, with the lesser wing-coverts blue, the vertical crest crimson, the hindhead silky-white, the forehead, lores, and chin black. The length is seven inches. The bird is confined to southern Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, and northern parts of the Argentine Republic.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Chevrolat, 1873.

stephanos (ste-fā-nos), n.: pl. stephanoi (-noi). [< Gr. στέφανος, a wreath, crown. < στέφανω, put around, encircle, wreath, crown. Cf. stemma.] In Gr. archaeol.: (a) A wreath awarded as a prize to the victor in a public contest, or as a token of honor, especially in recognition of some public service. Such wreaths were sometimes of natural leaves, as of the olive, laurel, oak, parsley, or pine, and sometimes of leaves of metal, as gold, and their award was a very usual distinction among the Greeks. In this sense very commonly expressed by the translators as 'crown,' as in the famous oration "On the Crown" of Demosthenes. (b) A head-ornament or crown akin to the stephane, from which it differs in that it preserves the same height all round, instead of diminishing toward the sides. See cut in preceding column.

Stephanotis (ste-fā-nō'tis), n. [NL. (Thouars, 1806), so called in allusion to the corona of five flattish petaloid bodies or auricles; < Gr. στέφανος, a crown, + ὄψ (ōp-), ear.] 1. A genus of asclepiadaceous plants, of the tribe Marsdenieae, distinguished from Marsdenia by its large white salver-shaped or funnel-form corolla. There are about 14 species, of which 5 are natives of Madagascar, 5 of the Malay archipelago and southern China, 3 of Cuba, and 1 of Peru. They are smooth shrubby twiners, often high-climbing, bearing opposite deep-green fleshy or coriaceous leaves, and beautiful fragrant waxy flowers in umbelliform cymes between the petioles. The cylindrical corolla-tube is dilated at the base and often again at the throat, and spreads into five overlapping oblique lobes. The fruit consists of two thick horizontal follicles, with numerous comose seeds. S. floribunda is a favorite evergreen greenhouse climber, commonly known by its generic name stephanotis, also as waxflower, and sometimes, from its native country, as Madagascar jasmine or chapel-flower.

2. [L. c.] A plant of this genus.

step-ladder (ste'lad'ér), n. A ladder having flat steps, or treads, in place of rungs, and usually provided with an adjustable supporting frame.

stepmother (ste'p-mu'th'ér), n. [ME. stepmoder, stepmoder, < AS. stæpmōdor (= OFries. stepmoder = D. stiefmutter = MLG. stiefmutter = OHG. stifmutter, MHG. stifmutter, G. stiefmutter = Icel. stjúpmodur = Sw. stifmoder = Dan. stifmoder), < steóp, step-, + mōdor, mother.] 1. A woman who is the wife of one's father, but is not one's mother.

No, be assured you shall not find me, daughter,
After the slander of most stepmothers,
Evil-eyed unto you. Shak., Cymbeline, i. 1. 71.

2. A horny filament shooting up by the side of the nail. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. The pansy. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.]—Stepmother's blessing, a hangnail. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

stepmotherly (ste'p-mu'th'ér-li), a. [< stepmother + -ly.] Pertaining to or befitting a stepmother; hence, figuratively, harsh or neglectful: in allusion to the behavior popularly attributed to stepmothers.

step-parent (ste'pār'ent), n. A stepfather or stepmother.

steppe (step), n. [= F. D. G. Dan. steppe = Sw. stepp, < Russ. stepi, a waste, heath, steppe.] A more or less level tract devoid of trees: a name given to certain parts of European and Asiatic Russia, of which the most characteristic feature is the absence of forests. The word steppe was introduced into the scientific literature of western Europe by Humboldt, in whose "Ansichten der Natur"—a work widely circulated, and translated into all the most important European languages—there is a chapter entitled "Steppen und Wüsten" (Steppes and Deserts). The steppe region in Europe begins on the borders of Holland, and extends through northern Germany—where such lands are called Heiden (heaths)—into Russia in Europe, and beyond the Ural Mountains almost to the Pacific Ocean, for a distance of about 4,500 miles. Although the steppes are in general characterized by the lack of an arboreal and the presence of a grassy vegetation, and by a pretty uniformly level surface, there are many breaks in this botanical and topographical monotony, in the form of forests extending along the streams, large patches of dense and sometimes tall shrubbery, lakes (both fresh and saline), rolling hills, ridges, barren sands, and patches covered with saline efflorescence. The general character of the region is pastoral, and the population (especially of the Asiatic steppes) nomadic; but all this has been to a considerable extent interfered with by the spread of Russian civilization and the domination of Russian authority. The Russian and Siberian steppes pass southward into the deserts of central Asia, and northward into the tundra region of the extreme north. Humboldt, in the work named above, occasionally uses the term steppe in describing the pampas and llanos of South America, and the plains, prairies, and barrens of the northern division of the New World, and his example has been followed to a certain extent by other physical geographers writing in regard to America; but the word steppe is nowhere in popular use except as to places where Russian is the dominating language.

Some of the Asiatic Steppes are grassy plains; others are covered with succulent, evergreen, articulated soda-plants: many glisten from a distance with flakes of exuded salt which cover the clayey soil, not unlike in appearance to fresh fallen snow. Humboldt, Aspects of Nature (trans.).

Steppe murrayn, rinderpest.

stepped (stept), a. [< step + -ed.] 1. Formed in or forming a step or a series of steps.—2. Supported, as a vertical shaft, by a step, step-like bearing, or shoe.—Stepped cone. Same as cone.

pulley.—Stepped gable, gage, gearing. See the nouns.—Stepped pyramid, a form of pyramid of which the faces, instead of continuing in one slope from base to apex, are formed in a more or less even series of enormous steps. Some of the oldest of the Egyptian pyramids present this form.

Steppe I Pyramid, Sakkarah, Egypt.

stepper (ste'p'ér), n. [< step + -er.] One who or that which steps (with a certain gait or carriage expressed or implied); specifically, a fast horse: often in composition: as, a high-stepper; that horse is a good stepper.

The mare's a stepper, and Phil King knows how to handle the ribbons. The Century, XXXVIII, 377.

stepping (ste'p'ing), n. 1. Collectively, the steps of a joint in which the parts at their junction form a series of reentrant angles, thus resembling a flight of steps, as in the fitting of the doors to the front frames of safes.—2. Collectively, a series of step-like bearings, as the bearings for the spindles of a spinning-frame or spooling-machine, or of a ball-winding machine.

stepping-point (ste'p'ing-point), n. Same as bearding, 1.

stepping-stone (ste'p'ing-stōn), n. 1. A raised stone in a stream or in a swampy place designed to save the feet in walking.—2. A horse-block. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. An aid or means by which an end may be accomplished or an object gained; an assistance to progress.

stepsister (ste'p'sis'tér), n. [ME. stepsystyr (= D. stiefzuster = MHG. G. stiefschwester = Sw. stiftsyster = Dan. stiftsoster); < step + *sis*ter.] One's stepfather's or stepmother's daughter by a former marriage.

stepson (ste'p'sun), n. [ME. stepsone, stepsune, < AS. stæpsun (= D. stiefsohn = MLG. stiefsohn = OHG. stifsohn, MHG. stifsohn, G. stiefsohn = Icel. stjúpson = Sw. stifson = Dan. stifson), < steóp, step-, + sunu, son.] A son of one's husband or wife by a former marriage.

step-stone (ste'p'stōn), n. Same as stepping-stone. [Rare.]

step-vein (ste'p'vān), n. In mining, a vein filling a fissure, consisting alternately of flats, or horizontal, and steeply inclined or vertical parts, resembling in form a flight of steps.

-ster. [ME. -ster, -estre, -estre, -estere, < AS. -estre, used fem. of -ere, as in webbestre, a female weaver (E. webster), fithelstre, a female fiddler, witegestre, a female prophet, etc.; = D. -ster, as in spinster, a female spinner (= E. spinster), etc., = LL. -ster, as in poetaster (see -aster, poetaster, criticaster, etc.), also in oleaster; < Indo-Eur. -as + -tar.] A termination denoting occupation, as in maltster, gamester, spinster, songster, etc. In the earliest times, and up to about the end of the thirteenth century, it was generally the sign of the feminine gender, corresponding to the masculine -ere or -er. In the fourteenth century it began to give place as a feminine termination to the Norman -ess, with which it was later often combined, as in seamstress, scampstress, songstress, or, if it survived, was used chiefly as masculine, and took on new meanings of contempt or depreciation, as in trickster, gamester, gunster, etc., or indicated simple agency or existence, as in decmster, doomster, huckster, tapster, teamster, upholster, roadster, youngster, etc. Some of the older nouns with this suffix survive as surnames, as Baxter, Webster, Sangster, Dempster, etc.

ster. An abbreviation of sterling?

steraclet, n. [Early mod. E., also sterracle, sterakel; < ME. steracle; origin obscure.] A strange thing, sight, or performance; a prank.

Whan thou art sett upon the pynacle,
Thou xalt ther plyn a qweynt steracle,
Or ellys shewe a grett meracle, Thysself from hurte thou save.

Country Mysteries, p. 208. (Halliwell) stercobilin (ster'kō-bil-in), n. [L. stercus (stercor-), dung, + bilis, bile, + -in.] The brown coloring matter of the feces.

stercoraceous (ster'kō-rā'shius), a. [L. stercus (or-), dung, + -aceus.] 1. Pertaining to, composed of, or in any way resembling dung, ordure, or feces; excrementitious; fecal.—2. In entom., frequenting or feeding on dung, as many beetles, flies, etc.—Stercoraceous vomiting, in pathol., vomiting of fecal matter.

stercoræmia, n. See stercoræmia.

stercoral (stér-kō-rāl), a. and n. [L. stercorarius, I. a. Of or pertaining to dung.]

II. a. Dung; excrement.

Stercoranism (stér-kō-rān-izm), n. [< Stercorarius, I. a.] In eccl., hist., the doctrine or mode of life of the Stercorarians. Also Stercorianism.

Stercoranist (stér-kō-rān-ist), n. [= F. stercorarius, ML. Stercoranista, < L. stercus (-or-), dung.] A name applied by opponents to various persons in the church who were said to hold a grossly materialistic conception of the Lord's Supper. They were alleged to believe that the Lord's body was like other food consumed, digested and evacuated. The word was first used by Cardinal Humbert in 1054. Also Stercorianist, Stercorianism.

stercoraceous (stér-kō-rā-rē-us), a. Same as stercoraceous.

Stercorarian (stér-kō-rā-rī-an), n. [< L. stercorarius, pertaining to dung (< stercus (-or-), dung.) + -an.] Same as Stercoranist.

Stercorarianism (stér-kō-rā-rī-an-izm), n. [< Stercorarian + -ism.] Same as Stercoranism.

Stercorariinae (stér-kō-rā-rī-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Stercorarius + -inae.] The dung-hunters, a subfamily of Laridae, typified by the genus Stercorarius: same as Lestridinae. See cuts under skua and Stercorarius.

Stercorarius (stér-kō-rā-rī-us), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), < L. stercorarius, pertaining to dung: see stercorary.] The dung-hunters, skuas, or jagers, a genus of Laridae, typical of the subfamily Stercorariinae. Also called Lestris. The name is used (a) for all the species of the subfamily; for the larger species, as S. skua, the smaller being called Lestris (see cut under skua); (c) for the smaller species, S. parasiticus.

Parasitic Jaeger, Stercorarius parasiticus.

pomatorhinus, S. parasiticus, and others, the larger being called Buphagus or Megalestis.

stercorary (stér-kō-rā-rī), a. and n. [< L. stercorarius, pertaining to dung (*ML. neut. stercorarium, a place for dung), < stercus (-or-), dung.] I. a. Pertaining or relating to dung or manure; consisting of dung. D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days, p. 17.

II. n.; pl. stercoraries (-riz). A place, properly secured from the weather, for containing dung.

stercorate (stér-kō-rāt), v. t.: pret. and pp. stercorated, ppr. stercorating. [< L. stercoratus, pp. of stercorare, dung, manure, < stercus (-or-), dung.] To manure or dung. Scott, Pirate, iv.

stercorate (stér-kō-rāt), n. [< stercorate, v.] Dung; excrement. Imp. Dict.

stercoration (stér-kō-rā-shōn), n. [< L. stercoratio(n), a dunging or manuring, < stercorare, pp. stercoratus, dung, manure, < stercus (-or-), dung.] The act of manuring with dung. Everh., To Mr. Wotton.

stercoremia, stercoræmia (stér-kō-rē-mi-ä), n. [NL. stercoræmia, < L. stercus (-or-), dung, + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] Contamination of the blood from retained feces.

Stercorianism, Stercorianist (stér-kō-rī-an-izm, -ist). Same as Stercoranism, Stercoranist.

stercoricolous (stér-kō-rī-kō-lūs), a. [< L. stercus (-or-), dung, + color, inhabit.] Inhabiting excrement; dwelling in dung. Encyc. Brit., XIX, 842.

Stercorist (stér-kō-rīst), n. [< L. stercus (-or-), dung, + -ist.] A Stercorianist.

stercorite (stér-kō-rīt), n. [< L. stercus (-or-), dung, + -ite.] A hydrous phosphate of ammonium and sodium, found in guano on the west coast of Africa.

stercory (stér-kō-rī), n. [< L. stercus (-or-), dung.] Excrement; dung. Mir. for Mags., III, 246.

Sterculia (stér-kū-lī-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), < L. stercus (-or-), dung, + -ia, a fleshy or named, < stercus (stercor-), excrement.] 1. A genus of plants, type of the order Sterculiaceæ and of the tribe Sterculiæ. It is characterized by a stamen-column usually with fifteen anthers crowded without regular order, a five-celled ovary with two or more Flowering Branch of Sterculia platyfolia. a, a male flower; b, the same before anthesis; c, the stamens; d, the fruit.

ovules in each cell, and a fruit of distinct spreading dehiscent carpels. There are about 85 species, natives of warm climates, especially of tropical Asia. They are most commonly large trees, with simple feather-veined leaves, and unisexual flowers in drooping panicles, with a colored bell-shaped calyx, and a fruit of five radiating woody follicles opening on the upper edge; but none of these characters is universal. Their inner bark is composed of a tough fiber which is not affected by moisture, and is in many species a valuable material for cordage, mats, bags, paper, or tow for upholstery. Their seeds are filled with an oil which may be used for lamps, and are slightly acrid but often edible. They are mucilaginous, and often exude an abundance of gum resembling gum tragacanth, swelling into a jelly in cold water without dissolving. S. urens, and perhaps other species, furnish a share of the Indian tragacanth, or kutera gum; S. Tragacantha of western Africa yields the African or Senegal tragacanth. S. acerifolia of New South Wales, a large tree sometimes 80 feet high and 8 feet in girth, with large lobed leaves and racemes of showy red flowers, is known as flame-tree, and also as lacebark from its beautiful lace-like inner bark, which becomes 2 inches thick and is valued for many uses. S. diversifolia, the Victorian bottle-tree, or currijong, is a stout tree with coarser fiber; for the similar S. rupestris, see bottle-tree, and for S. villosa, see oadal. S. lurida, the sycamore of New South Wales, also yields a fiber, there made into fancy articles. S. quadrifida, the calool of eastern and northern Australia, produces clusters of brilliant scarlet fruits, each with ten or eleven black seeds resembling filberts in taste, and eaten as a substitute for them. S. Carthaginensis (S. Chicha), the chicha or panama, yields seeds eaten as nuts in Brazil and northward; it is a handsome tree with yellowish purple-spotted flowers. S. foetida (see stavewood) is the source of some native remedies in Java. S. alata has been called Buddha's coconut; S. platyfolia of Japan and China, sultan's parasol. See maho and cassoumba.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

Laporte, 1835.

Sterculiaceæ (stér-kū-lī-ä-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Ventenat, 1799), < Sterculia + -acæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the cohort Malvales, intermediate between the two orders Malvaceæ and Tiliaceæ, resembling the former in its variety of habit and foliage and its frequently monadelphous stamens, and the latter in its two-celled anthers. It includes about 730 species, belonging to 49 genera, classed in 8 tribes, natives mostly of the tropics, or occurring further to the south in Africa and Australia.

sterculiaceous (stér-kū-lī-ä-shi-us), a. Of or pertaining to the plant-order Sterculiaceæ.

sterculiad (stér-kū-lī-ad), n. A plant of the order Sterculiaceæ. Lindley.

Sterculiæ (stér-kū-lī-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Sterculia + -æ.] A tribe of plants, of the order Sterculiaceæ. It is characterized by unisexual or polygamous flowers without petals, commonly with a colored calyx, and five to fifteen anthers adnate at the summit of a long or short column of united filaments, and either crowded or arranged in a definite series or a ring. It includes 8 genera, of which Sterculia is the type. They are natives mostly of tropical Asia and Africa, extending into Australia and Java. See Sterculia.

stere¹. A Middle English form of steer¹, steer², stir¹, stoop².

stere² (stär), n. [= F. stère, < Gr. στερεός, solid, cubic; prob. < √ sta as in istavai, stand.] A cubic meter; the French unit for solid measure, equal to 35.31 cubic feet. The word stere is but little used, except with reference to cordwood, cubic meter being the expression in universal use for the solid unit.

Sterelmintha (ster-el-min-thä), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Gr. στερεός, stiff, hard, solid, + ἐλμινθ (ē- μυθ), a worm.] The parenchymatous endoparasitic worms, having no intestinal canal. They formed one of two main divisions, the other being Cœlemintha, into which the Entozoa were divided by Owen in 1843, corresponding to the parenchymatous intestinal worms or vers intestinaux parenchymataux of Cuvier. They are such as the cestoid and trematoid worms, or tapes and flukes.

sterelminthic (ster-el-min-thik), a. [< Sterelmintha + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Sterelmintha.

sterelminthus (ster-el-min-thus), a. Same as sterelminthic.

stereo- (stér-ē-ō, also, especially in trade use, stér-rē-ō). An element of Greek origin, meaning 'solid.'

stereo (stér-ē-ō), n. and a. [Short for stereotype.] Same as stereotype: as, a stereo plate; stereo apparatus.

stereobate (stér-ē-ō-bāt), n. [= F. stéréobate, < Gr. στερεός, solid, firm, + βάτος, verbal adj. of βαίνω, go, step: see base².] In arch., the substructure, foundation, or solid platform upon which a building is erected. In columnar buildings it includes the stylobate, which is the uppermost step or platform of the foundation upon which the columns stand.

Stereobate of the Parthenon, east front (illustrating the convex curvature of the best Greek Doric temple foundations).

stereobatic (stér-ē-ō-bat'ik), a. [< stereobate + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a stereobate; of the character of a stereobate. Encyc. Brit., II, 408.

stereoblastula (stér-ē-ō-blas'tū-lä), n.; pl. stereoblastulæ (-læ). [NL., < Gr. στερεός, solid, + βλαστός, a germ.] A solid blastula; a blastula in which there is no cavity. J. A. Ryder.

stereochrome (stér-ē-ō-krōm), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + χρῶμα, color.] A stereochromic picture. See stereochromy.

stereochromic (stér-ē-ō-krō'mik), a. [< stereochromy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stereochromy; produced by stereochromy.—Stereochromic process, the method of painting by stereochromy.

stereochromy (stér-ē-ō-krō-mi), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + χρῶμα, color.] A method of painting in which water-glass serves as the connecting medium between the color and its substratum.

stereo-clumps (stér-ē-ō-klumps), n. pl. [< stereo + clump.] Sectional blocks of type-metal or wood, usually three fourths of an inch high, made of different sizes so that they can be combined to fit and uphold any size of stereotype plate. When clamps are added, they keep the plate secure in the process of printing. [Eng.] stereo-electric (stér-ē-ō-ē-lek'trik), a. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + E. electric.] Noting the electric current which ensues when two solids, especially two metals, as bismuth and antimony, are brought together at different temperatures.

stereogastrula (stér-ē-ō-gas'trō-lä), n.; pl. stereogastrulæ (-læ). [NL., < Gr. στερεός, solid, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A solid gastrula; a form of gastrula in which no cleavage-cavity is developed. J. A. Ryder.

Stereognathus (stér-ē-ōg'nä-thus), n. [NL. (Charlesworth, 1854), < Gr. στερεός, solid, + γνάθος, jaw.] A genus of fossil mammals of problematical character from the Lower Oolite of Oxfordshire, England, later identified with Microlestes. The original fossil was named S. ooliticus.

stereogram (stér-ē-ō-gram), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + γράμμα, a writing, < γράφω, write: see gram².] A diagram or picture which represents objects in such a way as to give the impression of relief or solidity; specifically, a double photographic picture or a pair of pictures mounted together for the stereoscope; a stereoscopic picture.

stereograph (stér-ē-ō-gráf), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + γράφω, write.] Same as stereogram.

stereographic (stér-ē-ō-gráf'ik), a. [= F. stéréographique: as stereograph-y + -ic.] Showing the whole of a sphere on the whole of an infinite plane, while preserving the angles.—

Stereographic map-projection. See projection.
stereographical (ster'ē-ō-graf'i-kal), a. [< stereographic + -al.] Same as stereographic.

stereographically (ster'ē-ō-graf'i-kal-i), adv.
In a stereographic manner; by delineation on a plane.

stereography (ster'ē-ō-gra-fī), n. [= F. stéréographie, < Gr. στερεός, solid, + γραφία, < γραφω, write.] The art of delineating the forms of solid bodies on a plane; a branch of solid geometry which demonstrates the properties and shows the construction of all solids which are regularly defined.

Stereolepis (ster'ē-ol'e-pis), n. [NL. (Ayres, 1859), < Gr. στερεός, solid, + λείψ, a scale.] 1. A genus of serranoid fishes of enormous size in comparison with related forms. S. gigas, the Jew-fish or black sea-bass of the California coast, reaches a Jew-fish Stereolepis gigas.

length of 5 feet. It is brownish or greenish-black with large black blotches, most evident in the young.

2. [l. c.] A fish of this genus.

stereome (ster'ē-ōm), n. [< Gr. στερεώμα, a solid body, < στερεός, solid.] In bot., a name proposed by Schwendener for those elements which impart strength to a fibrovascular bundle. Compare metome.

stereometer (ster'ē-ōm'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + μέτρον, a measure.] 1. An instrument for measuring the solid capacity of a vessel.—2. An instrument for determining the specific gravity of liquids, porous bodies, etc.

stereometric (ster'ē-ō-met'rik), a. [< stereometry + -ic.] Pertaining to or performed by stereometry.—Stereometric function. See function.

stereometrical (ster'ē-ō-met'ri-kal), a. [< stereometer + -al.] Same as stereometric.

stereometrically (ster'ē-ō-met'ri-kal-i), adv. By or with reference to stereometry.

stereometry (ster'ē-ōm'e-tri), n. [= F. stéréométrie, < Gr. στερεός, solid, cubic, + μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] 1. The art of measuring volumes.—2. The metrical geometry of solids.—3. The art or process of determining the specific gravity of liquids, porous bodies, powders, etc.

stereo-mold (ster'ē-ō-mōld), n. [< stereo + mold³.] A mold used in stereotyping.

stereomicroscope (ster'ē-ō-mon'ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + μόνος, single, alone, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument with two lenses for exhibiting on a screen of ground glass a single picture so as to give it all the effect of solidity.

stereoneural (ster'ē-ō-nū'al), a. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + νευρῶν, a nerve.] Having the nervous center, if any, solid.

stereoplasm (ster'ē-ō-plazm), n. [< NL. stereoplasma, *< Gr. στερεός, solid, + πλάσμα, anything molded or formed; see plasm.*] 1. In corals, a delicate endotheal structure occupying different positions in the corallite, often forming vertical processes in the interseptal loculi or encircling septa, or acting as true endotheca. This substance, which connects septa (envolving their free edges in some paleozoic corals), stretches across interseptal loculi irregularly, and sometimes fills up the lower part of the inside of the corallum, constituting a solid mass there. It is to be distinguished from the true endotheca.

2. In bot., same as stereoplasma.

stereoplasma (ster'ē-ō-plas'mā), n. [NL.: see stereoplasma.] 1. Same as stereoplasma. 1. Lindström.—2. In bot., a term proposed by Naegeli for the solid part of protoplasm. Compare hygroplasma.

stereoplasmic (ster'ē-ō-plaz'mik), a. [< stereoplasma + -ic.] Of the nature of or formed by stereoplasma; consisting of that substance.

stereopticon (ster'ē-ōp'ti-kon), n. [*< Gr. στερεός, solid, + ὀπτικός, pertaining to seeing or sight; see optic.*] An improved form of magic lantern, consisting essentially of two complete lanterns matched and connected. The object of the duplication is to permit the pictures shown to pass from one to the next by a sort of dissolving effect which is secured by alternate use of the two lenses, and at the same time to avoid the delay or the unpleasant sliding of the pictures across the field in view of the audience, but imperfectly avoidable when the simple magic lantern is used. The two lanterns may be either superposed or Double-tier Stereopticon.

A, A', tubes containing objectives; B, B', covers for condensers; C, C', small polished glass fronts; D, the lanterns, which are mounted on one side of the frame and hinged together at the rear stand (A, B, C, D) to provide for the elevation or depression necessary to bring the views on the screen into exact superposition. E, E', fine light boxes, one of the fine light boxes F in the oxygen jet (G) being shown in the upper box, a part of which is removed; H, oxygen-holder; I, hydrogen-holder; J, J', flexible tubes for separately conveying these gases to the burners and mixing them only as they are needed to supply light. L, set-screw for elevation or depression; M, milled heads of shaft operating gear for extending or shortening the lens-tubes A, A' in adjustment of the focus; N, openings for insertion of slides, with inclined bottoms for insuring exact position.

placed side by side. Some forms of stereopticon are made with three lanterns.

stereoscope (ster'ē-ō-skōp), n. [= F. stéréoscope, < Gr. στερεός, solid, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An optical instrument illustrating the phenomena of binocular vision, and serving to produce from two nearly similar pictures of an object the effect of a single picture with the appearance of relief and solidity belonging to ordinary vision. It depends upon the fact that in ordinary vision, while the respective images of an object formed upon the retinas of the two eyes differ slightly because of the divergence of the rays from each point of the object, yet the effect upon the brain is that of a single object seen in perspective relief which the monocular image lacks. The slide of the stereoscope shows two pictures side by side taken under a small difference of angular view, each eye looking upon one picture only; thus, as in ordinary vision, two images are conveyed to the brain which unite into one, exhibiting the objects represented under a high degree of relief. A reflecting form of stereoscope was invented by Sir Charles Wheatstone in 1838. Subsequently Sir David Brewster invented the lenticular or refracting stereoscope, based on the refractive properties of semi-double-convex lenses. This is the one now in general use. There are many forms of it, one of which is shown in the figure. The action is illustrated by the diagram beneath. The light-rays from corresponding points of the two pictures P and P' are refracted in passing through the lenses L, L', and their directions changed so that they now seem to the eyes E, E' to diverge from a common point A beyond the plane of the card. By special effort a skilled observer can combine stereoscopic pictures into one without the use of the instrument, each eye being directed to one picture only and (to produce the normal stereoscopic effect) the one on its own side; the process may be facilitated by interposing a card screen between the pictures so that, for example, the left picture is entirely cut off from the right eye, etc. If the eyes are crossed so that the right eye sees the left picture and the left eye the right only, and the images combined by special effort, the usual stereoscopic effect is reversed—a convex surface becomes concave, etc. A similar pseudoscopic result is obtained with the ordinary stereoscope if the positions of the two pictures are exchanged.

stereoscopic (ster'ē-ō-skōp'ik), a. [= F. stéréoscopique; as stereoscope + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling the stereoscope; adapted to the stereoscope; having the form in relief, or proper perspective, as of an object seen in the stereoscope; as, stereoscopic pictures; stereoscopic views.—Stereoscopic camera, diagrams, projection. See the nouns.

stereoscopical (ster'ē-ō-skōp'i-kal), a. [< stereoscopic + -al.] Same as stereoscopic.

stereoscopically (ster'ē-ō-skōp'i-kal-i), adv. By or as by a stereoscope.

stereoscopist (ster'ē-ō-skō-pist), n. [< stereoscope + -ist.] One versed in the use or manufacture of stereoscopes.

stereoscopy (ster'ē-ō-skō-pi), n. [= F. stéréoscopie, < Gr. στερεός, solid, + σκοπεῖν, < σκοπέω, view.] The use or construction of stereoscopes.

stereotomic (ster'ē-ō-tōm'ik), a. [< stereotom-y + -ic.] Pertaining to or performed by stereotomy.

stereotomical (ster'ē-ō-tōm'i-kal), a. [< stereotomic + -al.] Same as stereotomic.

stereotomy (ster'ē-ōt'ō-mi), n. [= F. stéréotomie, < Gr. στερεό, solid, + τέμνω, < τέμνω, cut.] The science or art of cutting solids into certain figures or sections.

stereotrope (ster'ē-ō-trop), n. [< Gr. στερεός, solid, + τροπή, a turning, < τρέπω, turn.] An instrument by which an object is perceived as if in motion and with an appearance of solidity or relief as in nature. It consists of a series of stereoscopic pictures, generally eight, of an object in the successive positions it assumes in completing any motion, affixed to an octagonal drum revolving under an ordinary lenticular stereoscope, and viewed through a solid cylinder pierced in its entire length by two apertures, which makes four revolutions for one of the picture-drum. The observer thus sees the object constantly in one place, but with its parts apparently in motion and in solid and natural relief.

stereotype (ster'ē-ō-tip), n. and a. [= F. stéréotype, *< Gr. στερεός, fixed, + τύπος, impression, type; see type.*] 1. n. 1. The duplicate, in one piece of type-metal, of the face of a collection of types composed for printing. Three processes are used. (a) The plaster process, in which a mold taken from the composed types in fluid plaster of Paris is baked until dry, and is then submerged in melted type-metal. The cast taken in this mold, when cooled, is shaved to proper thickness, making the stereotype plate. (b) The clay process, in which the mold, taken by a press on a prepared surface of stiff clay, is baked until dry, and filled by pouring into it fluid metal. (c) The papier-mâché process, in which the mold is made by covering the type with a preparation of paper-pulp and clay, which is beaten into the interstices of the type-surface by a stiff brush. This mold when baked by steam-heat is put in a casting-box, which is filled with melted metal. This is the rudest but quickest process. Stereotypes for daily newspapers are usually made in fifteen minutes. For newspaper-work the plates for rotary presses are molded and cast with a curved surface that fits them to the impression-cylinder. The practice of stereotyping is now confined to newspapers and the cheaper forms of printed work. Plates of books, woodcuts, and the finer forms of printing are now made by the electrolyte process. (See electrotype.) Stereotype plates were first made, but imperfectly, by William Ged, at Edinburgh, in 1725. The plaster process, which was the first to become popular, was invented by Weldon and Lord Stanhope in 1810. 2. Loosely, an electrolyte.—3. The art of making plates of fixed metallic types; the process of producing printed work by means of such plates.

II. a. Of or pertaining to stereotype, or stereotyping, or stereotype printing; as, stereotype work; stereotype plates.

stereotype (ster'ē-ō-tip), v. t.; pret. and pp. stereotyped, ppr. stereotyping. [< stereotype, n.]

1. To cast a stereotype plate from: as, to stereotype a page or a form.—2. To prepare for printing by means of stereotype plates: as, to stereotype the New Testament.—3. To fix or establish firmly or unchangeably.

If men cannot yet entirely obey the law, . . . it does not follow that we ought therefore to stereotype their incompetency, by specifying how much is possible to them and how much is not.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 506.

stereotype-block (ster'ē-ō-tip-blok), n. A block of iron or of hard wood, bound with brass, about three fourths of an inch high, on which a stereotype plate is fixed for use.

stereotyped (ster'ē-ō-tipt), p. a. 1. Made or printed from stereotype plates.—2. Formed in an unchangeable manner; fixed; set: as, stereotyped opinions.

The entablatures show considerable progress, but the capitals were so stereotyped that it is evident, if any Greek or Roman artists had designed capitals in Gandhara during the period just alluded to, we could predicate exactly what they would have been.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 178.

stereotype-metal (ster'ē-ō-tip-met'al), n. An alloy for stereotype plates; type-metal.

stereotyper (ster'ē-ō-ti-pēr), n. [< stereotype + -er¹.] One who stereotypes, or who makes stereotype plates.

stereotypery (stēr'ē-ō-pī-ri), n. [stereotype + -ery.] 1. The art or work of making stereotypes. — 2. Pl. stereotyperies; iz. A place where stereotype plates are made: a stereotypery.

stereotypic (stēr'ē-ō-tī'pik), a. [stereotype + -ic.] Of or relating to stereotype or stereotypic plates.

stereotyping (stēr'ē-ō-tī-ping), n. The art, act, or process of making stereotypes. — Paper process of stereotyping. See paper.

stereotypist (stēr'ē-ō-tī-pist), n. [stereotype + -ist.] One who makes stereotype plates; a stereotypist.

stereotypographer (stēr'ē-ō-tī-pog'ra-fēr), n. [stereotypography + -er.] A stereotypographer.

stereotypography (stēr'ē-ō-tī-pog'ra-fī), n. [Gr. στέρεος, fixed, + E. typography.] The art or practice of printing from stereotype. Imp. Dict.

stereotypy (stēr'ē-ō-tī-pī), n. [= F. stéréotypie; as stereotype + -y.] The art or business of making stereotype plates.

sterhydraulic (stēr-hī-drā'lik), a. [Irreg. < Gr. στερής, solid, + E. hydraulic.] Pertaining to or having an action resembling that of a sterhydraulic press. See the phrase. — Sterhydraulic press, a peculiar form of hydraulic press in which pressure is generated in a hydraulic cylinder by the displacement of a part of the contained liquid through the entrance into its mass of a rod working through a stuffing-box, a screw working in a packed nut, or in some cases a rope wound upon a barrel in the inclosure and pulled into it through a packed hole, the shaft of the winding-barrel or drum also extending through a stuffing-box in the side of the cylinder, and fitted on the exterior with a winch or a driving-wheel. Of these forms that using a screw is the simplest and best.

sterigma (stēr-ig'mā), n.; pl. sterigmata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. στήρυμα, a prop, support, < στήριξις, prop.] In bot., a stalk or support of some kind: a term of varying application. (a) Same as basidium. (b) The stalk-like branch of a basidium which bears a spore. (c) The footstalk of a spore, especially of a spore of minute size. (d) The cell from which a spermatium is cut off. (e) A ridge or foliaceous appendage proceeding down the stem below the attachment of a decurrent leaf.

sterigmatic (stēr-ig-mat'ik), a. [< sterigma (t) + -ic.] In bot., resembling, belonging to, or of the nature of a sterigma.

sterile, a. An obsolete spelling of sterile.

sterile (stēr'il), a. [Formerly also steril; < F. stérile = Sp. Pg. esteril = It. sterile, < L. sterilis, unfruitful, barren; cf. Gr. στερεός, stiff, hard, solid, στέρεος, hard, unfruitful, barren.] 1. Unfruitful; unproductive; not fertile.

Indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 310.

It is certain that in sterile years come sown will grow to an other kinde. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 525.

2. Barren; not reproducing its kind.

She is grown sterile and barren, and her births of animals are now very inconceivable. Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

3. In bot., of a flower, producing only stamens — that is, staminate or male (compare neutal); of a stamen, having no anther, or a functionless one; of an anther, without pollen; of an ovary, without perfect seeds; of a seed, without an embryo; of a frond, without sori. See cuts under Oenocia, Ophoglossum, sassafras, and smoke-tree.

4. Free from living germs.

I at first suspected that the biologically sterile tube might not be chemically clean. Medical News, XLIX. 400.

5. Leading to no results; fruitless; profitless; useless.

I will endeavour that the favour conferred on me rest not sterile. Abbé Mann, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 431.

6. Lacking richness of thought or expression; bald; bare: as, a sterile style; sterile verse. — Sterile wood, a shrub or small tree, Coprosma foetidissima, of the Rubiaceae, found in New Zealand. It is extremely fetid when dry, though inodorous when alive and growing.

sterilisation, sterilise, etc. See sterilization, etc.

sterility (stēr-il'i-tī), n. [< F. stérilité = Sp. esterilidad = Pg. esterilidade = It. sterilità, < L. sterilitas (t-s), unfruitfulness, barrenness, < sterilis, barren, sterile; see sterile.] The state or character of being sterile. (a) Lack of fertility; unproductiveness; unfruitfulness, as of land, labor, etc.

For the Soil of Spain, the Fruitfulness of their Vallies recompenses the Sterility of their Hills. Hovell, Letters, i. iii. 32.

(b) Lack of fecundity; barrenness: said of animals or plants.

Suspend thy purpose, if thou didst intend
To make this creature fruitful!

Shak., Lear, i. 4. 300.

(c) Fruitlessness; profitlessness.

The truthness of this formula is only equalled by its sterility for psychological purposes.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 551.

(d) Deficiency in ideas, sentiments, or expression; lack of richness or luxuriance, as in literary style; poverty; baldness; meagerness.

He had more frequent occasion for repetition than any poet; yet one cannot ascribe this to any sterility of expression, but to the genius of his times, which delighted in these reiterated verses. Pope, Essay on Homer.

sterilization (stēr'il-i-zā'shon), n. [< sterilize + -ation.] The act or operation of making sterile; specifically, the process of freeing from living germs. Also spelled sterilisation.

Sterilization of cow's milk must and will be a most valuable preventive of summer diarrheas.

Medical News, LIII. 12.

sterilize (stēr'il-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. sterilized, ppr. sterilizing. [= F. stériliser = Sp. Pg. esterilizar; as sterile + -ize.] To render sterile or unproductive in any way; specifically, in bacteriology, to render free from living germs, as by heating or otherwise. Also spelled sterilise.

No, no — such wars do thou, Ambition, wage!
Go sterilize the fertile with thy rage!
Whole nations to depopulate is thine.

Savage, Public Spirit.

Prof. Tyndall found that he could not sterilize an infusion of old hay . . . without boiling it continuously for several hours. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 309.

sterilizer (stēr'il-i-zēr), n. [< sterilize + -er.] One who or that which sterilizes; especially, any apparatus for rendering substances free from living germs, as by means of heat. Also spelled steriliser.

sterkt. An old spelling of stark, stirk.

sterlet (stēr'let), n. [< F. sterlet = Dan. sterlet = Sw. sterlett, < G. sterlet, < Russ. sterlyadi, a sterlet.] A species of sturgeon, Acipenser ruthenus. It is of small size and slender form, with a long sharp snout and fringed barbels, and from sixty to seventy lateral shields. It rarely reaches a length of two feet, and is generally not more than a foot long. It inhabits the Black Sea, Sea of Azov, Caspian Sea, and the rivers of Asiatic Russia, as well as certain rivers of Siberia. It is highly esteemed for its flavor, and its roe makes a superior caviar. Compare also cuts under Acipenser.

Sterletus (stēr'le-tus), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1820), < F. sterlet, < Russ. sterlyadi, sterlet; see sterlet.] A genus of sturgeons, the type of which is the sterlet, having the spines of the dorsal shield posterior, no stellate plates, and the lip emarginate.

sterling, n. An obsolete form of sterling.

sterling (stēr'ling), n. and a. [< ME. sterling, sterlinge, sterlynge, sterling, the coin so called; cf. D. sterling = Sw. Dan. sterling, sterling (as in mod. E. use), = Icel. sterlingr, a sterling (the English coin so called), = MHG. sterline, sterline (-ling), a coin so called, G. sterling (as in mod. E. use); = OF. esterlin, a sterling (the English coin so called), sterlin, esterlin, estellin, estelin, a weight of twenty-eight grains (of gold), the twentieth part of an ounce, = Sp. Pg. esterlino, in libra esterlina, a pound sterling, = It. sterlino, in lira sterlina, a pound sterling, also as a noun, sterlino, sterling coin, standard rate (of coin); ML. sterlingus, sterlingum, sterlinus, stellinus, stelligus, sterlingus, sterlingus, esterlingus, estrilingus, a sterling (the English coin so called), also a weight of twenty-eight grains, the twentieth part of an ounce; all < E., unless, as Kluge asserts, the E. itself (and so in part the OF. and ML.) is < MHG. sterline, sterline (-ling), which is then < sterl- or ster-, origin unknown, + -ing or -ling as in shilling, farthing (AS. feorthing, feorhtling), penny (AS. pening, etc.). In this view the word must have been introduced into ME. use by the Hanse merchants in London, who, according to the story, first stamped the coin in England. The accepted statement is that these merchants were called Easterlings as coming from "the east parts of Germany" (Camden), and that the coin received its name from them; but the similarity appears to be accidental, and the statement, besides other deficiencies, fails to explain the MHG. name, which could not have meant 'Easterling.' It seems more probable that the MHG. word is, like the rest, derived from the ME. word, which must then be due, in spite of unexplained difficulties, to Easter- ling, or else is derived, as asserted in a statement quoted by Minshew from Linwood, from the figure of a sterling (ME. sterling) at one time engraved on one quarter of the coin so called: see *sterling*¹. Historical evidence of the truth of this assertion is as yet lacking.] I. n. 1†. A silver coin struck by English (and Scottish) kings from the time of Richard I. (1190).

Faste comen out of halle
And shoken nobles and sterlinges.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1315.

The oldest pieces [of the coinage of Scotland] are silver pennies or sterlings, resembling the contemporary English money, of the beginning of the 12th century. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 656.

2. English money. [Rare.]

And Roman wealth in English sterling view. Arbuthnot.

II. a. 1. Of fixed or standard national value; conforming to the national standard of value: said of English money, and, by extension, of the precious metals: as, a pound sterling; a shilling sterling. Abbreviated ster., stg.

In the Canon Law mention is made of 5 shillings sterling, and a merke sterling, cap. 3. de Arbitris, & c. constitut. 12. de procurator. Minshew, 1617.

When a given weight of gold or silver is of a given fineness, it is then of the true standard, and called sterling or sterling metal. Blackstone, Com., I. vii.

I lost between seven and eight thousand pounds sterling of your English money. J. S. Le Fanu, Dragon Volant, v.

2. Of acknowledged worth or influence; authoritative.

If my word be sterling yet in England,
Let it command a mirror hither straight,
That it may show me what a face I have.

Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 264.

3. Genuine; true; pure; hence, of great value or excellence.

His sterling worth, which words cannot express,
Lives with his friends, their pride and their distress.

Crabbe, Works, II. 27.

I might recall other evidence of the sterling and unusual qualities of his public virtue.

R. Choate, Addresses, p. 321.

sterling³ (stēr'ling), n. See *sterling*².

Sterling's formula. See formula.

stern¹ (stēr'n), a. [< ME. stern, sterin, sterne, sturne, < AS. styrne, severe, austere, stern (also in comp. stýrn-mōd, stern-minded); akin to OHG. stornēn, be astonished, sturni, stupor; perhaps related to OHG. storēn, MHG. storren, stand out, project, = *Goth. staurran, in comp. and-staurran, murmur against, also to D. stuursch, stern, = Sw. stursk, refractory, and to Icel. stúra, gloom, despair, stúra, mope, fret.] 1. Severe in disposition or conduct; austere; harsh; rigorous; hard.

No Man was more gentle where there was Submission; where Opposition, no Man more stern.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 132.

And sterner hearts alone may feel

The wound that time can never heal.

Byron, The Giaour.

2. Characterized by severity or rigor; especially, resulting from or expressive of harshness: as, a stern reply; a stern glance; a stern rebuke.

He herd their strakes, that war ful sterin.

Yvaine and Gawain, l. 3219. (Halliwell.)

If wolves had at thy gate howl'd that stern time, Thou shouldst have said, "Good porter, turn the key."

Shak., Lear, iii. 7. 63.

Gods and men

Fear'd her stern frown. Milton, Comus, l. 446.

3. Grim or forbidding in aspect; gloomy; repelling.

In passing through these stern and lofty mountains, their path was often along the bottom of a baranco, or deep rocky valley. Irvine, Granada, p. 88.

4. Rough; violent; tumultuous; fierce.

The werre wox in that wonderly stern.

Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 337.

Those stern waves, which like huge mountains roll.

Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 435.

5. Rigid; stringent; strict.

Subjected to stern discipline by the rigid enforcement of uniform motives. Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 8.

6†. Stout; strong; heavy.

The hamur bothe sterne and gret

That drof the nayles thorow hond and fete.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 184.

Of bak & of brest al were his bodi sturne.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 143.

7. Firm; unyielding; inflexible; hard.

When that the poor have cried, Cæsar hath wept:

Ambition should be made of sterner stuff.

Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 97.

The sterner sex. See *sex*¹. = Syn. 1. Severe, Harsh, Strict, etc. See austere. — 1 and 2. Unrelenting, uncompromising, inflexible.

stern² stérn, n. [< ME. stern, stern, stern (not found in AS., where only stear, a rudder, appears: see *stear*¹, n.) = OFries. storne, sturne, a rudder, = lecl. stjörn, a steering, steering, rudder; with formative -n, from the root of AS. stear, E. stear, etc., a rudder: see *stear*¹, n. and v.] 1†. The rudder or helm of a vessel.

3† he ne rise the rather and rauhte to the stearne.
The wynt wolle with the water the bot ouer-throwe.
Piers Plouman (A), ix. 30.

But to preserve the people and the land,
Which now remain as shippe without a stearne.
Norton and Sackville, Ferrex and Porrex, v. 2.

2†. Hence, figuratively, any instrument of management or direction; a guiding agent or agency; also, a post of direction or control.

The father held the stern of his whole obedience.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 48.

Not a few of them [the eunuchs] have come to sit at the stern of State.
Sandys, Travails, p. 55.

3. The hinder part of a ship or boat, where the rudder is placed; the part furthest removed such as S. minuta of Europe and S. antillarum of America, are called least terns, and all have a white frontal crescent in the black cap: these represent a subgenus

Common Tern—Sterna bergii

Sternula. (See cut under Sternula.) Some middle-sized terns with dark upper parts, widely distributed in tropical and warm temperate regions, are the subgenus Haliplana, as the common sooty and bridled terns, S. fuliginosa and S. anæsthetica. (See cut under sooty.) Gull-billed terns form a section Gelochelidon (see cut there). The wholly white terns, the black terns, and the noddies belong to other genera. See Sterninae and tern.

sternadiform (stér-ná-di-fórm), a. [< NL. sternum, the breast-bone, + L. ad, to, + forma, form.] In ichth., characterized by a tendency to expansion or extension of the thoracic or sternal region, as exemplified in the John-dory and the Serranidæ. Gill.

sternage (stér-nāj), n. [*< stern*² + -age.] Steerage; direction; course, as of a ship or fleet.

Follow, follow:
Grapple your minds to sternage of this navy,
And leave your England, as dead midnight still.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. Frol., l. 18.

sternal (stér-nal), a. [= F. sternal, < NL. sternalis, < sternum, the breast-bone: see sternum.]

1. Of or pertaining to the sternum, especially the breast-bone of vertebrates: as, the sternal end of the clavicle; the sternal keel of a bird's breast-bone; sternal articulation; a sternal segment.—2. In Invertebrata, of or pertaining to a sternite; sternitic.—3. Ventral; hemal; on the ventral surface or aspect, where the sternum is situated; on the same side with the sternum; in man, anterior; in other animals, inferior: opposed to dorsal, tergal, or neural.—Sternal band, in embryol., of insects, a longitudinal thickening of the ovum, which gives rise to the sternal region of the body.—Sternal canal, in Crustacea, a median passage between each pair of endosternites, arched over by the meeting of the mesophragmal apophyses of the apodemes of opposite sides. The sternal canal conveys the chain of nervous ganglia and the sternal artery. See cut under Astacidæ.—Sternal glands, a chain of six to ten small lymphatic glands, situated along the course of the internal mammary blood-vessels.—Sternal line, the vertical line on the front of the chest lying over the edge of the sternum.—Sternal region, the region of the front of the chest lying between the sternal lines. It is divided into a superior and an inferior sternal region by a line passing through the uppermost points of the junctions of the third costal cartilages with the sternum.—Sternal rib. (a) A true or fixed rib; one that joins the sternum by its hemapophysis, or costal cartilage, as distinguished from a false rib. See cut under endoskeleton. (b) The hemapophysis of a rib, as distinguished from the pleurapophysis; that part of a bony jointed rib answering to the costal cartilage of a mammalian rib, reaching from the end of the pleurapophysis to the sternum or toward it, as distinguished from a vertebral rib, which is the pleurapophysis alone. See cuts under epipleura and interclavicle.

sternalgia (stér-nal'jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. stérp-ia, the breast-bone, + algos, pain.] 1. Pain about the sternum or breast-bone.—2. Specifically, angina pectoris. See angina.

sternalgic (stér-nal'jīk), a. [< sternalgia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with sternalgia; especially, affected with angina pectoris.

sternalis (stér-nā'lis), n.; pl. sternalis (-léz). [NL., sc. musculus, muscle: see sternal.] A sternal or presternal muscle; specifically, the rectus sternalis of various animals, more expressly called sternalis brutorum and rectus thoracicus superficialis. It is not infrequently present in man.

Sternaspida (stér-nas'pī-dā), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Sternaspis (-aspīd-) + -ida.] An order of gephyreans, represented by the genus Sternaspis; distinguished from an order Echiurina, both being referred to a subclass Echiuromorpha of the class Gephyrea. Compare Echiuroidæ.

Sternbergia (stér-nér'jī-ā), n. [NL. (Waldestein and Kitaibel, 1805), named after Count Kaspar Maria von Sternberg, 1761–1838, author of various botanical and paleontological works.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Amarylloideæ and tribe Amarylleeæ. It is characterized by a commonly solitary funnel-shaped perianth without a corona and with somewhat spreading lobes, and by a fleshy nearly indehiscent fruit with roundish and often strophiolate seeds. About 12 species have been described, now by some reduced to 5, all native of Europe and the Mediterranean region. They produce a short flower-stalk from a coated bulb, with leaves at the same time or earlier. S. lutea and several other dwarf species with handsome yellow flowers are cultivated under the name of star-flower. S. lutea is also known as winter daffodil, and S. Etnensis as Mount Etna lily; these are often sold under the name of amaryllis.

sternbergite (stér-nér'gīt), n. [Named after Count K. M. von Sternberg: see Sternbergia.] An ore of silver, a sulphid of silver and iron, having a pinchbeck-brown color and metallic luster. It occurs foliated, the laminae being soft and flexible. It leaves a mark on paper like that of graphite.

stern-board (stér-n'bórd), n. Naut., a backward motion of a vessel. See to make a stern board, under board.

stern-cap (stér-n'kap), n. An iron cap to protect the stern of a boat.

stern-chase (stér-n'chās), n. A chase in which two vessels sail on one and the same course, one following in the wake of the other: as, a stern-chase is a long chase.

stern-chaser (stér-n'chā'sér), n. A cannon placed in a ship's stern, pointing backward, and intended to annoy a ship that is in pursuit.

Sterneæ (stér-nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sterna + -æ.] A subdivision of Sterninae, containing all the sea-swallows with forked tails and emarginate webs, as distinguished from the Anoæ or noddies; the typical terns. Coues, 1862.

sterneber (stér-nē-bér), n. [< NL. sternebra, < sternum + (vert) ebra.] One of the pieces of which the breast-bone of a vertebrate usually consists; a bony segment of the sternum; a sternite, or sternal element. The sternum is a serially segmented bone, made up of pieces, primitively separate bones, corresponding to pairs of ribs, every one of which is a sterneber. Thus, in man the manubrium sterni and the xiphoid or ensiform cartilage are each a sterneber; and the gladiolus, the middle part of the breast-bone, is composed of four other sternbers.

sternbral (stér-nē-bral), a. [< sterneber + -al.] Entering into the composition of the breast-bone; of or pertaining to a sterneber.

sterned¹ (stérnd), a. [*< stern*² + -ed.] Having a stern (of a specified character). Chapman, Iliad, xi.

sterned² (stérnd), a. [ME., *< stern*³ + -ed.] Starred; starry. Hampole, Prick of Conscience.

sterner (stér-nér), n. [*< stern*² + -er.] A steersman; a guide or director. [Rare.]

He that is "regens sidera," the sterner of the stars.
Dr. Clarke, Sermons (1637), p. 15. (Latham.)

stern-fast (stér-n'fást), n. A rope or chain used to confine the stern of a ship or other vessel to a wharf or quay.

stern-frame (stér-n'frām), n. The several pieces of timber or iron which form the stern of a ship—the stern-post, transoms, and fashion-pieces.

sternfully (stér-n'fūl-i), adv. [*< sternful (irreg. < stern + -ful) + -ly.] Sternly. Stanishurst, Conceits. [Rare.]

stern-gallery (stér-n'gal'ē-ri), n. Naut. See gallery, 9.

stern-hook (stér-n'hūk), n. In ship-building, a curved timber built into the stern of a ship to support the stern-frame.

Sternidæ (stér-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sterna + -idæ.] The Sterninae rated as a family apart from Laridæ.

Sternidius (stér-nīd-i-us), n. [NL. (Le Conte, 1873).] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, equivalent to Liopus (Leopius of Serville, 1835). S. acutiferus is a common North American species now placed in Leptostylus. Its larva burrows under the bark of various trees.

Sternidius acutiferus sterniform (stér-nī-fórm), a. [< NL. sternum, the breast-bone, + L. forma, form.] In entom., having the form or appearance of a thoracic sternum.—Sterniform process or horn, an anterior projection of the first ventral segment of the abdomen, between the bases of the posterior legs: it is more commonly called the intercoaxal process.

Sterninae (stér-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sterna + -inæ.] A subfamily of Laridæ, typified by the genus Sterna, containing all the terns or sea-swallows. It differs from Laridæ in the average smaller size, slenderer form, relatively longer wings and tail, the forking of the tail, the small feet, and the slender sharp bill. The bill is paragnathous (not epignathous as is usual in Laridæ), with continuous horny covering, usually long and slender, very sharp, with straight commissure or nearly so, gently curved culmen, long gonyes, and slight physal eminece. The wings are extremely long, narrow, stern² (stérn), v. [*< stern*², n.] I. trans. 1†. To steer; guide.

Hulke tower . . . is a notable marke for pilots, in directing them which waie to stern their ships, and to eschew the danger of the craggie rocks.

Stanishurst, Descrip. of Ireland, iii. (Holinshead.)

2. To back (a boat) with the oars; back water; row backward.—Stern all! stern hard! orders to back water given by the officer of a boat to the crew. Also simply stern!

II. intrans. To draw back; back water: said of a boat or its crew.

Meantime Mr. Norton, the mate, having struck the fast whale, he and the second mate sterned off to wait for the whale to get quiet.
Fisheries of U. S., v. ii. 273.

stern³ (stérn), n. Same as *stern*¹.

stern⁴ (stérn), n. [A var. of tern: see tern, and cf. Sterna.] A tern.

Sterna (stér-nā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), appar. based on E. tern.] A Linnean genus of Laridæ, typical of the subfamily Sterninae, and containing all the terns or sea-swallows, or variously restricted. It is now commonly confined to species of moderate and large size, white with usually a grey-blue mantle and black cap, and having a long deeply-forked tail, whose outer feathers are more or less narrowly linear for much of their length. The species are numerous, and are found all over the world, as S. hirundo, the common tern of Europe and America; S. arctica, the arctic tern of the northern hemisphere; S. paradisæ or dougalii, the roseate tern (see cut under roseate), very widely distributed; and S. forsteri and S. trudeana of America. Among the large species, representing a subgenus Thalasseyus, are S. tschegrawi or caspia, the Caspian tern of Asia, Europe, and America; S. maxima, the royal tern (smaller than the last, in spite of its name) of America; S. elegans, the ducal tern of America. (See cut under Thalassurus.) A group of small species,

... and the first primary with the longest, and ... The tail is usually long, and ... with attenuated outer feathers. The ... ambulatorial. There are 60 ... of the world. They are divided into two groups, the Sternæ or terns proper, including nearly all of the Sterninae, and the noddies or Anoæ. Most of the species fall into the single genus Sterna. Other genera are Hydrochelidon, Phaethon, Puffinus, Gygis, Larus, and Diomedea. See Sterna, and cuts there noted.

sternine (stér'nin), a. [NL. sterninus, < Sterna, tern.] Resembling or related to a tern; of or pertaining to the Sterna.

sternite (stér'nit), n. [NL. sternum, the breast-bone, + -ite.] 1. In Arthropoda, as an insect or a crustacean, one of the median ventral sclerites of the crust or body-wall; the median ventral piece of any segment, somite, or metamere, whether a distinct piece or only that undistinguished ventral part or region which lies between the insertions of any pair of legs or other appendages. The sternites are primitively and typically all alike, but may be variously modified in different regions of the body, or coalesced with one another or with other pieces of the exoskeleton, or suppressed. See cut under cephalothorax.

2. In entom., specifically, the under or ventral sclerite of an abdominal segment. [Rare.]—3. One of the pieces of the sternum or breast-bone of a vertebrate; a sterneber. [Rare.]—Antennary sternite. Same as epistoma (b).

sternitic (stér-nit'ik), a. [Sternite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a sternite; sternal, as a sclerite of an arthropod.

stern-knee (stér'nē), n. The continuation of a vessel's keelson, to which the stern-post is secured by bolts. Also called sternson and sternson-knee.

stern-light, n. [< stern + light.] Starlight. It was mirk mirk night, and there was nae stern light. Thomas the Rhymer (Child's Ballads, I. 112).

sternly (stér'li), adv. [ME. sternelich, sterneliche, sterneliche, < AS. stýrnlic, < stýrn, stern; see stern and -ly.] In a stern manner; with severity, harshness, austerity, or rigor.

sternmost (stér'n-móst), a. superl. [< stern + -most.] Furthest in the rear; furthest astern: as, the sternmost ship in a convoy.

sternness (stér'nēs), n. [ME. sternnesse, sternnesse; < stern + -ness.] The quality or character of being stern.

With sternnesse ze comaundide to hem, and with power. Wyclif, Ezek. xxxiv. 4.

sternochondroscapularis (stér-nō-kon-drō-skap-ū-lā'ris), n.; pl. sternochondroscapularis (-rēz). [NL. (sc. musculus, muscle), < Gr. stérpov, the breast-bone, + χόνδρος, cartilage, + NL. scapularis, q. v.] A muscle of some mammals, not infrequent in man, arising from the first costal cartilage and the sternum, and inserted into the superior border of the scapula. Also called chondroscapularis, scapulocostalis minor, costoscapularis, subclavius posticus.

sternoclavicular (stér'nō-kla-vik'ū-lār), a. [NL. sternoclavicularis, < Gr. stérpov, the breast-bone, + NL. clavicular: see clavicular.] Pertaining to the sternum and the clavicle. Also sternoclavicular, and sometimes clidosternal.—Sternoclavicular fibrocartilage. See fibrocartilage.—Sternoclavicular ligament. A band of ligamentous fibers uniting the sternum and the clavicle; an anterior and a posterior are distinguished in man.

sternoclavicularis (stér'nō-kla-vik'ū-lā'ris), n.; pl. sternoclavicularis (-rēz). [NL.: see sternoclavicular.] One of two anomalous muscles in man, anterior and posterior, extending over the sternoclavicular articulation.

sternoclidal (stér-nō-klī'dal), a. [< Gr. stérpov, the breast-bone, + κλειδ (klēid), key (clavicle), + -al.] Same as sternoclavicular.

sternoclidomastoid (stér-nō-klī-dō-mas'toid), a. and n. [NL. sternoclidomastoides, < sternum, q. v., + clidomastoides, q. v.] 1. a. In anat., of or belonging to the sternum, the clavicle, and the mastoid process. The sternoclidomastoid muscle arises from the summit of the sternum and the inner section of the clavicle, and is inserted into the mastoid process of the temporal bone. It is also called sternomastoid, masseter profundus, and cutate capitis. See cut under muscle 1.

II. n. The sternoclidomastoid muscle.

sternoclidomastoides (stér'nō-klī'dō-mas'toidēs), n.; pl. sternoclidomastoides (-ī). [NL.: see sternoclidomastoid.] The sternoclidomastoid muscle.

sternocoracoid (stér-nō-kor'ā-koid), a. and n. [NL. sternocoracoides, < sternum, q. v., + coracoides, q. v.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the coracoid: as, the sternocoracoid articulation of birds and reptiles; a sternocoracoid muscle.

II. n. The sternocoracoides.

sternocoracoides (stér-nō-kor'ā-koidēs), n.; pl. sternocoracoides (-ī). [NL.: see sternocoracoid.] The sternocoracoid muscle of various animals, arising from the sternum and inserted in the coracoid. It is represented in man by the pectoralis minor.

sternocostal (stér-nō-kos'tal), a. [< NL. sternocostalis, < sternum, q. v., + L. costa, rib: see costal.] Of or pertaining to the sternum and the ribs or costal cartilages; costosternal.

sternocostalis (stér'nō-kos-tā'lis), n.; pl. sternocostales (-lēz). [NL.: see sternocostal.] A thin median fan-shaped muscle within the thorax, behind the costal cartilages and breast-bone, arising from the lower part of the sternum. Also called transversus thoracis, and usually triangularis sterni.

sternocoxal (stér-nō-kok'sal), a. [< NL. sternocoxalis, < sternum, q. v., + L. coxa, the hip: see coxal.] Of or pertaining to the sternites and coxae of an arthropod.

sternofacial (stér-nō-fā'shal), a. and n. [< NL. sternofacialis, < sternum, q. v., + L. facies, face: see facial.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the face: as, a sternofacial muscle.

II. n. The sternofacialis.

sternofacialis (stér-nō-fā-shi-ā'lis), n.; pl. sternofaciales (-lēz). [NL.: see sternofacial.] A muscle of the hedgehog, arising over the fore part of the sternum and passing to the side of the lower jaw and integument of the face: it assists the action of the orbicularis pan-niculi.

sternoglossal (stér-nō-glos'al), a. and n. [< NL. sternoglossalis, < Gr. stérpov, breast-bone, + γλῶσσα, tongue.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the tongue: as, a sternoglossal muscle.

II. n. The sternoglossus.

sternoglossus (stér-nō-glos'us), n.; pl. sternoglossi (-ī). [NL., < Gr. stérpov, the breast-bone, + γλῶσσα, the tongue.] 1. A long retractor muscle of the tongue, as of the great ant-eater, Myrmecophaga jubata, attached behind to the sternum, and antagonizing the action of the protractor muscles, the genioglossus and stylohyoideus.—2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

sternohyoid (stér-nō-hi'oid), a. and n. [NL. sternohyoideus, < sternum, q. v., + hyoides: see hyoid.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the hyoid bone.—Sternohyoid muscle, a ribbon-like muscle arising from the manubrium sterni and inner extremity of the clavicle, and inserted into the body of the hyoid bone. It is innervated from the ansa hypoglossi, and its action draws down or back the hyoid bone and larynx. See cut under muscle 1.

II. n. The sternohyoid muscle.

sternohyoidean (stér'nō-hi-oi'dē-an), a. [< sternohyoid + -an.] Same as sternohyoid.—sternohyoideus (stér'nō-hi-oi'dē-us), n.; pl. sternohyoidei (-ī). [NL.: see sternohyoid.] The sternohyoid.

sternomastoid (stér-nō-mas'toid), a. and n. [< NL. sternomastoides, < sternum, q. v., + mas-toides, q. v.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the mastoid process of the temporal bone.—Sternomastoid artery. (a) A superficial descending branch of the superior thyroid artery, which is distributed to the sternomastoid, platysma, and the muscles attached to the thyroid cartilage. (b) A small muscular branch of the occipital artery which supplies the sternocleidomastoid.—Sternomastoid muscle. (a) That portion of the sternocleidomastoid which arises from the sternum. (b) The entire sternocleidomastoid, without distinction.

II. n. The sternomastoid muscle.

sternomastoides (stér'nō-mas-toi'dē-us), n.; pl. sternomastoides (-ī). [NL.: see sternomastoid.] The sternomastoid muscle.

sternomaxillaris (stér-nō-mak-si-lā'ris), n.; pl. sternomaxillares (-rēz). [NL.: see sternomaxillary.] The sternomaxillary muscle.

sternomaxillary (stér-nō-mak'si-lā-ri), a. [< NL. sternomaxillaris, < sternum, q. v., + L. maxilla, jaw: see maxillary.] Pertaining to the sternum and the mandible: applied to the sternomastoid muscle when, as in the horse, its anterior end is fixed to the mandible.

sternon (stér'non), n. [NL.: see sternum.] Same as sternum. Wiseman, Surgery. [Rare.]

sternopagus (stér-nop'ā-gus), n.; pl. sternopagi (-ī). [NL., < Gr. stérpov, breast, chest, + πάγος, that which is firmly set.] In teratol., a double monster with union at the sternum.

Sternoptychidæ (stér-nop-tik'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sternoptyx (-ptych-) + -idæ.] A family of inionom fishes, typified by the genus Ster- noptyx. (a) In Günther's system it includes the typical Sternoptychidæ and other families. (b) In Gill's system, a family of inionom fishes with a compressed ventradiform body, carinated contour, deeply and obliquely cleft or subvertical mouth whose upper margin is constituted by the supramaxillaries as well as intermaxillaries, branchiostegal arch near and parallel with lower jaw, scapular arch with an inferior projection, and one or more of the neural spines abnormally developed and projecting above the back in advance of the dorsal fin. There are 3 genera and about 7 species, small deep-sea fishes of remarkable appearance and organization, representing 2 subfamilies, Sternoptychinæ and Argyroplectinæ. Also Sternoptyx, Sternottidi, and Sternoptychoidæ.

sternoptychoid (stér-nop'ti-koid), a. and n. [< Sternoptyx (-ptych-) + -oid.] 1. a. Of, or having characteristics of, the Sternoptychidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Sternoptychidæ.

Sternoptyx (stér-nop'tiks), n. [NL. (Hermann, 1781), < Gr. stérpov, breast, chest, + πύξ, a fold.] A genus of fishes, so named from the transverse folds on the pectoral or sternal region, typical of the Sternoptychidæ.

sternorhabdite (stér-nō-rab'dit), n. In entom., one of the lowermost or sternal pair of rhabdites.

sternoscapular (stér-nō-skap'ū-lār), a. and n. [< NL. sternoscapularis, < sternum, q. v., + L. scapula, shoulder-blades: see scapular.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the scapula: as, a sternoscapular muscle.

II. n. The sternoscapularis.

sternoscapularis (stér-nō-skap'ū-lā'ris), n.; pl. sternoscapulares (-rēz). [NL.: see sternoscapular.] A muscle of many animals, connecting the sternum and the scapula, and forming with the serratus magnus and the levator anguli scapulae a sling in which the fore part of the body is supported upon the anterior extremities.

Sternotheridæ (stér-nō-thē'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sternotherus + -idæ.] A family of pleurodorous tortoises, typified by the genus Sternotherus, to which different limits have been assigned. As generally understood, they have eleven palstral bones, mesopastrals being distinct, and the skull has no bony temporal roof. The species are confined to Africa and Madagascar.

Sternotherus (stér-nō-thē'rus), n. [NL. (Bell, 1825), < Gr. stérpov, breast, chest, + θαίρος, the hinge of a door or gate.] A genus of tortoises, having a hinged plastron (whence the name).

sternothere (stér'nō-thēr), n. [< NL. Sternotherus, q. v.] An African turtle of the genus Sternotherus. P. L. Sclater.

sternothyroid (stér-nō-thi'roid), a. and n. [< NL. sternothyroideus, < sternum, q. v., + thyroides.] 1. a. In anat., of or pertaining to the sternum and the thyroid cartilage.—Sternothyroid muscle, a small muscle beneath the sternohyoid on either side, arising from the manubrium sterni, and inserted into the oblique line on the outer side of the thyroid cartilage: it is innervated from the ansa hypoglossi.

II. n. The sternothyroid muscle.

sternothyroideus (stér'nō-thi-roi'dē-us), n.; pl. sternothyroidei (-ī). [NL.: see sternothyroid.] The sternothyroid muscle.

sternotracheal (stér-nō-trā'kē-al), a. and n. [< NL. sternotrachealis, < sternum, q. v., + trachea: see tracheal.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sternum and the trachea; connecting the breast-bone and the windpipe, as a muscle.

II. n. The sternotrachealis.

sternotrachealis (stér-nō-trā'kē-ā'lis), n.; pl. sternotracheales (-lēz). [NL.: see sternotracheal.] A muscle which in birds passes from the sternum to the trachea or windpipe; one of a pair, or one pair of two pairs, of long slender muscular slips attaching the trachea to the sternum or the clavicle, or both.

sternotribe (stér-nō-trib), a. [< Gr. stérpov, the breast, + τρίβειν, rub.] In bot., touching the breast, as of an insect: noting those zygomorphic flowers, especially adapted for cross-fertilization by external aid, in which the stamens and styles are so arranged as to strike the visiting insect on the breast. Compare nototribe, pleurotribe.

Sternoxi (stér-nok'si), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Gr. stérpov, breast, + ὄξυς, sharp.] In entom., in Latreille's system, a section of Serricornes, containing two tribes, the buprestids and elaterids, having the prosternum produced in front and pointed behind: distinguished among the serricorn beetles from Malacodermi and Xylo-trogi. It corresponds to the modern families Buprestidæ and Elateridæ in a broad sense. See cuts under Agrius, Buprestis, click-beetle, Pyrophorus, and wireworm. Also Sternoxia.

sternoxian (stér-nok'si-an), a. and n. [< Sternoxi + -an.] Same as sternoxine.

sternoxine (stér-nok'sin), a. and n. [< Ster-noxi + -ine]. 1. a. Pertaining to the Sternoxi, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Sternoxi.

stern-port (stérn'pört), n. A port or opening in the stern of a ship.

stern-post (stérn'pöst), n. The principal piece of timber or iron in a vessel's stern-frame. Its lower end is tenoned into or riveted to the keel, and to it the rudder is hung and the transoms are bolted. See cuts under rudder and stern. — Stern-post knee, a large knee which unites the stern-post and the keel. See cut under stern.

stern-sheets (stérn'shêts), n. pl. The space in a boat abaft the thwart on which the rowers sit.

sternsman (stérnz'man), n. [< stern's, poss. of *stern*², + man]. A steersman; a pilot.

Off from the stern the sternsman dining fell.

And from his sinews flew his soule to hell.

Chapman, Odyssey, vii. 582.

sternson (stérn'son), n. [Appar. *< stern*² + -son as in hickson]. Same as stern-knee.

Sternula (stér'nū-lā), n. [NL. (Boie, 1822), < Sterna + dim. -ula]. The least tern, a genus of Sterninae containing species of the smallest size, with moderately forked tail, a white frontal crescent in the black cap, and the bill yellow tipped with black: of cosmopolitan distribution. S. minuta inhabits Europe, Asia, etc.; S. balaenarum is South African; S. macris, S. placens, and S. melanachena are Asiatic, East Indian, Australian, and Polynesian; S. superciliosa is South American. The common bird of the United States and middle America is S. antillarum.

American Least Tern. Sternula antillarum.

larum, which is very abundant along the Atlantic coast. It is 9 inches long and 20 in extent of wings, white with pearly-blue mantle over all the upper parts, a black cap, and the usual white lunule.

sternule (stér'nūl), n. A sea-swallow of the genus Sternula.

sternum (stér'nūm), n.; pl. sterna (-nā) or sternumina (-nūmz). [NL., also sternon, < Gr. στέρνον, the breast-bone.] 1. The breast-bone of man and many other vertebrates: a bone or longitudinal series of bones in the middle line of the ventral aspect of the body, chiefly in its thoracic section, completing the thoracic wall by articulation with more or fewer ribs, or elements of the scapular arch, or both: theoretically, in Owen's system, the hemal spines of a series of vertebræ. (a) In man and most mammals the sternum consists of an anterior piece, the "handle," manubrium, or presternum; of several (in man four) segments or sternobones constituting the body of the sternum, the gladioli, or mesosternum; and of a terminal piece, the xiphoid or ensiform cartilage, or xiphisternum. It articulates in man with the clavicles and with seven costal cartilages. The sternobones of a mammalian sternum may remain perfectly distinct, or be ankylosed in one. (See cut under mesosternum.) In cetaceans and sirenians the sternum is much reduced, and may be a single bone or quite rudimentary. In the monotrematous mammals a small median bone called prosteon is developed in front of the presternum. The parts called episternum, omosternum, interclavicle, in the mammals just mentioned, or in various reptiles, or in batrachians, belong rather to the shoulder-girdle. There is no sternum in some reptiles, as serpents. See cuts under Catarrhina, Elephantinae, interclavicle, omosternum, and skeleton. (b) In birds the sternum is a large single bone without trace of its original composition of several parts, highly specialized in form and function, in relation to the muscular apparatus of the wings, articulating with several ribs, with the coracoids, and sometimes ankylosed with the clavicle; it appears under two principal modifications, known as the carinate and ratite. (See these words.) The carinate sternum normally develops from five ossific centers, having consequently as many separate pieces in early life. The single median ossification, which includes the keel, is the lophostee; the anterior lateral pieces, a pair, are the pleurostee, which become the costal or costiferous processes; the posterior pair are the metostee. In some birds are additional pieces, a pair of coracostee and a urostee. The ratite sternum has no median ossification, or lophostee. The passerine sternum normally develops a prominent forked manubrium. In a few birds, as cranes and swans, the sternum is hollowed out to receive convolutions of the windpipe. See cuts under carinate, Dromis, and epileura. (c) In Chelonis, the plastron of a turtle, consisting of several bones, normally nine, one median, and four lateral in pairs. These bones have no homology with the sternum of other vertebrates. See cuts under carapace, plastron, and Chelonis.

2. In arthropods, as insects and crustaceans, a median sternal or ventral sclerite of any somite of the cephalothorax, thorax, or abdomen; a sternite: the opposite of a tergite or notum. In such cases, sternum and sternite are used interchangeably, sternum being seldom used of the series of sternites as a whole. (See cut under cephalothorax.) In insects the three thoracic sterna are specified as prosternum, mesosternum, and metasternum. In Diptera, sternum generally means the mesosternum, as the other thoracic rings do not show a sternal piece. In Chironomida, sternum is sometimes extended to include the episterna and epimera, or whole lower surface of a thoracic segment. See episternum, 3. — Antennary sternum. See antennary. — Cephalic sternum, in arachnology, the lower part of the head or gula; the central plate on the lower part of the cephalothorax of a spider, between the bases of the legs. — Sternum collare, in entom., the sternal prominence of the prothorax. — Sternum pectorale, in entom., the sternal prominence of the metathorax.

sternutative (stér-nū-tā-tiv), a. [< L. sternutare, sneeze, + -ive]. Same as sternutatory. Bailey, 1731.

sternutiveness (stér-nū-tā-tiv-nes), n. The character of being sternutative. Bailey, 1727.

sternutatory (stér-nū-tā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. sternutatoire, < L. sternutare, sneeze: see sternutation]. 1. a. Causing or tending to cause sneezing. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 476.

II. n.; pl. sternutatories (-riz). Anything which causes sneezing, as snuff; an errhine.

sternutary (stér'nū-tō-ri), n. An erroneous form of sternutatory. Dunglison.

sternward, sternwards (stérn'wārd, -wārdz), a. and adv. [*< stern*² + -ward, -wards]. Toward the stern.

sternway (stérn'wā), n. The movement of a ship backward, or with her stern foremost. — To fetch sternway. See fetch.

stern-wheeler (stérn'hwē'lér), n. A steam-vessel propelled by one wheel, similar to a side-wheel, mounted astern: used for navigating shallow or narrow waters.

Steropus (stér'ō-pus), n. [NL. (Megerle, 1821), appar. < Gr. στέρπος, solid, + -opus = E. foot]. A genus of beetles of the family Carabidae, containing about 100 species, widely distributed throughout Europe, northern Africa, Asia, Australia, and both Americas.

sterquilinous (stér-kwi-lī'nus), a. [< L. sterquilinum, sterculinum, stercitum, < stercus, dung.] Pertaining to a dunghill; hence, mean; dirty; paltry. Howell, Letters, ii. 48.

sterraster (ste-ras'tér), n. [< Gr. στέρρος, var. of στερεός, solid, + ἀστέρ, star.] A form of sponge-pole characteristic of the family Geodiniæ. It is of the polyaxon type, having many rays coalesced for the greater part of their lengths, but ending in separate hooklets.

Sterrastrosa (ster-as-trō'sā), n. pl. [NL.: see sterraster]. In Sollas's classification, a group of eboristidan tetractinellid sponges, in which sterrasters are present, usually in addition to simple asters, as in the families Geodiniæ and Placospongiæ: distinguished from Spirastrosa and Eustrastrosa.

sterrastrose (ste-ras'trōs), a. [< NL. sterrastrosus, < sterraster, q. v.] Provided with sterrasters, as a sponge; of or pertaining to the Sterrastrosa: distinguished from Spirastrose.

sterret, n. A Middle English form of *star*¹.

sterrinck (stér'ingk), n. A seal of the genus Stenorhynchus (Ogmorhinus) or of the subfamily Stenorhynchinae: as, the saw-toothed or crab-eating sterrinck, Lobodon carcinophagus.

sterro-metal (stér'ō-met'al), n. An alloy of about three parts of copper with two of zinc, to which a small amount of iron and tin is added. This alloy is not in general use, but is said to be superior to gun-metal in tenacity, while at the same time less expensive. It has been used in Austria for the pumps of hydraulic presses.

stert (stért), n. A dialectal spelling of *start*¹.

stert², n. A Middle English form of *start*².

stert³, [inf. sterte], pret. sterte, pp. stert.] An obsolete preterit of *start*¹.

stertor (stér'tor), n. [< NL. stertor, < L. stertere, snore.]. A heavy snoring sound, which accompanies inspiration in certain diseases.

Compare stertorous.

stertorous (stér'tō-ri-us), a. [< stertor + -i-ous]. Same as stertorous. Poe, Prose Tales, I. 125.

stertorousness (stér'tō-ri-us-nes), n. Same as stertorousness. Poe, Prose Tales, I. 125.

stertorous (stér'tō-rus), a. [< stertor + -ous]. Characterized by a deep snoring sound, such as characterizes the laborious breathing which frequently accompanies certain diseases, as apoplexy.

stertorously (stér'tō-rus-li), adv. In a stertorous manner.

stertorousness (stér'tō-rus-nes), n. The quality or state of being stertorous.

stervet, v. A Middle English form of starve.

Stesichorean (ste-sik-ō-rē'an), a. [< LL. Stesichoreus, < Gr. Στεσιχόρεος, Stesichorean, < Στεσιχόρος, Stesichorus (see def.)].

Of or pertaining to the Greek lyric poet Stesichorus (Tisias) of Himera (about 632–550 B. C.), inventor of epodic composition; specifically, in anc. pros., noting (a) a trochaic trimeter of the form — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — —; (b) an encomiologic verse; (c) a line consisting of two dactylic tetrapodies, the last foot a spondee.

stet (stet), [L., 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. act. of stare, stand: see stand]. Let it (that is, the original) stand: a proof-reader's order to cancel an alteration previously made by him. It is indicated by putting a line of dots under what is crossed out, and writing "stet" in the margin. Abbreviated st.

stet (stet), v. t.; pret. and pp. stetted, ppr. stetting. To mark with the word "stet"; direct or cause to remain, after deletion, as printed; forbear to delete. [Colloq.] stetch (stech), n. A ridge between two furrows, as in plowed land. [Prov. Eng.] stetch (stech), v. t. [< stetch, n.] To form into ridges with a plow: followed by up. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] stethiaem (steth-i-ē'um), n.; pl. stethiaem (-ā). [NL., < Gr. στήθιας, of the breast, < στήθος, the breast.] In ornith., the entire anterior half of a bird: opposed to uræum. [Rare.] stethidium (stē-thid'i-um), n.; pl. stethidia (-ā). [NL., dim. of Gr. στήθος, the breast.] In entom., the thorax. Illiger.

stethograph (steth'ō-gráf), n. [< Gr. στήθος, the breast, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for recording the respiratory movements of the thorax. Also called pneumograph.

stethographic (steth'ō-graf'ik), a. [< stethograph + -ic]. Of or pertaining to, or obtained by means of, the stethograph. Nature, XLII. 581.

stethometer (stē-thom'e-tér), n. [< Gr. στήθος, the breast, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the respiratory movements of the walls of the chest. In one form a cord or band is extended round the chest, and its extension, as the thorax is expanded, is shown by an index on a dial-plate.

stethoscope (steth'ō-skōp), n. [= F. stéthoscope, < Gr. στήθος, the breast, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument used in auscultation to convey the sounds from the chest or other part of the patient to the ear of the observer. — Bin-a-ural stethoscope, a stethoscope in which the sound is conducted to both ears. — Differential stethoscope, a double stethoscope having elastic tubular branches and bells which can be applied to different parts of the thorax so as to compare the indications at various points.

stethoscope (steth'ō-skōp), v. t.; pret. and pp. stethoscoped, ppr. stethoscoping. [< stethoscope, n.] To examine by means of a stethoscope. Lancet, 1890, II. 1267.

Stethoscopes.
a, binaural stethoscope.

stethoscopic (steth-ō-skop'ik), a. [< stethoscope + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stethoscopy or the stethoscope; obtained by means of the stethoscope.

stethoscopic (steth-ō-skop'i-kal), a. [< stethoscopic + -al.] Same as stethoscopic.

stethoscopically (steth-ō-skop'i-kal-i), adv. In a stethoscopic manner; by means of the stethoscope.

Stevia (stē'vi-ä), n. [NL. (Cavanilles, 1797), named after Estevé, a Spanish scientist.] 1. A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Eupatoriaceæ and subtribe Agerateæ. It is characterized by crowded corymbose or loosely panicle heads with five or six nearly equal involucre bracts, five flowers, appendaged anthers, and a variable pappus of several scales or awns or of both mingled in the same head. Over one hundred species have been described, natives of the warmer parts of America from Buenos Ayres to Mexico, and especially numerous westward; absent in tropical Brazil and nearly so in Guiana. They are herbs or shrubs, often somewhat rigid, or rarely diffuse. Their leaves are usually opposite, three-nerved, and serrate, sometimes entire or three-parted. The flowers are white or purplish, forming slender heads. Several species are cultivated as border-plants in Europe. In the United States S. compacta and S. serrata, bearing a profusion of small white fragrant flowers, the latter flowering later, are grown under glass in great quantities for cutting and for winter use in houses. S. serrata and five other species extend within the United States into Arizona or Texas.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

stew¹ (stū), n. [< ME. stewe, stue, stuw, stw, etc., pl. stewes, stues, stuwes, stywes, stives, stywes, < OF. estuve, estouwe, a heated room, hothouse, bath-room, F. étuve, a vapor-bath, stove, = *Sp. Or lowly factor for another's gain.

Shak., Rich. III., iii. 7. 133.

The hedge broke in, the banner blew,
The butler drank, the steward scrawl'd.

Tennyson, Day-Dream.

2. An officer or retainer appointed to perform duties similar to those mentioned above; especially, a person appointed to provide and distribute food and all the requisites of the table; a purveyor. (a) In some British colleges, one who has charge of the commons. (b) One of a ship's company whose duty it is to distribute provisions to the officers and crew. In passenger-ships he has charge of the table, servants, staterooms, etc., and is called distinctively chief steward, the title steward being also extended to his male helpers—those who wait at table and attend to the staterooms. In a man-of-war the paymaster's steward is now styled paymaster's yeoman (see yeoman); the cabin-steward, ward-room steward, steerage-steward, and warrant-officers' steward are petty officers charged with providing for their several messes and keeping the apartments in order.

3. Figuratively, a manager; especially, one who controls expenditure; a disburser.

A man is but a steward of his own goods; wherof God one day will demand an account.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 251.

And what not rare? Luxury being the steward, and the treasure unexhaustible.

Sandys, Travails, p. 25.

4. Formerly, in the English gilds, one of the officers in charge of the finances of the society; also, a corresponding functionary in municipal affairs. The title is still given in English towns to magistrates varying in functions, authority, rank, etc. In this latter case it is usually qualified by some limiting word: as, the city steward of York; the land steward of Norwich: the town steward of Northampton; the lord high steward of Gloucester.

That the stewards of every craft that ben contributory shullen be called to the accounte to knowe the charge.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 385.

5. In the early church, same as economic or economicus.—6. A fiscal agent of certain bodies; specifically, in the Methodist Church, an officer having charge of the finances and certain other material interests of the church.—Hospital steward. See hospital. Lord high steward of England, one of the former great officers of state: his chief functions were at an early date assumed by the justiciar. This office was the inheritance of the Earls of Leicester, till forfeited by Simon de Montfort to Henry III., at the close of whose reign it was abolished as a permanent dignity. A lord high steward is now created only for particular occasions—namely, a coronation or the trial of a peer—the office to cease when the business requiring it is ended. In the former case the lord high steward is commissioned to settle matters of precedence, etc.; in the latter, to preside in the House of Lords.—Lord steward of the household, in England, one of the chief officers of the royal household. He is the head of the court called the Board of Green Cloth, which has the supervision of the household expenses and accounts and their payment, the purveyance of provisions, etc.; but his duties are practically performed by a permanent official called the master of the household. The lord steward is a peer and a member of the ministry.—Steward, or high steward of Scotland, an ancient officer of the crown of the highest dignity and trust. He had not only the administration of the crown revenues, but the chief oversight of all the affairs of the household, and the privilege of the first place in the army, next to the king, in battle.—Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds. See Chiltern Hundreds, under hundred.

stick¹ (stik), v.; pret. and pp. stuck, ppr. stick-¹ing. [A verb confused in form and meanings with stick², stick¹ being more prop. steek (as in dial. uses) or steak* (after the analogy of break, speak, etc.); E. dial. stuck, Sc. steik, etc.; < ME. stiken, pret. steken (pret. stak, pp. steken, i-steken, y-steke, stiken, stoken; also, by conformity with stick², pret. stiked, stikede, pp. stiked), *< AS. stecan (pret. stæc*, pp. steccen*), pierce, stab, = OS. stekan (pret. stak) = OFries. steka = MD. D. steken = MLG. LG. steken = OHG. stechan, stechhan, MHG. G. stechen (pret. stach, pp. gestochen), pierce; not found in Scand. or Goth. (the Goth. form would be stikan*; cf. Goth. staks, a mark, stigma, stiks, a point, a moment of time); Teut. √ stik = L. √ stig (in instigare, prick, instigate, stingere* (in comp. distinguere, distinguish, extinguere, extinguish), stimulus, a prick, goad, stilus, a point, style, etc.) = Gr. √ sty (in στειχω, prick, στήχυα, a prick, mark, spot) = Skt. √ tij for tij*, be sharp. From this root are ult. E. stick², stick³, stitch, steak, sting, etc., and through OL. ticket, etiquette (from a collocation of stick, ticket, etiquette, stake, stung, stole, stoker, etc.); from the L. root are ult. E. style, distinguish, extinguish, distinct, extinct, instinct, stimulate, stimulus, instigate, prestige, etc. The verb *stick*¹, pierce, has been confused, partly in ME. and completely in mod. E. with its derivative *stick*². The reg. mod. pret. of *stick*¹ would be stack* or stake* (as in ME.), but the pret. has yielded to the influence of the pp., and, becoming stoke*, appears in mod. E. with shortened vowel stuck, as also in the pp. (cf. break, pret. brake, now broke, pp. broken; spake, pret. spake, now spoke, pp. spoken—verbs phonetically parallel to *stick*¹).] I. trans. 1. To pierce or puncture with a pointed instrument, as a dagger, sword, or pin; pierce; stab.

spines of the back. They are small fishes, a few inches long, of 5 genera, Gasterosteus, Pygosteus, Eucalia, Apeltes, and Spinachia, but very pugnacious and rapacious, being especially destructive to the spawn and fry of many larger fishes. They inhabit fresh waters and sea-arms of northern Europe, Asia, and North America stickleback, or three-spined stickleback, banstickle, burnstickle, or titstickle. Another is the nine-spined stickleback. The fifteen-spined stickleback, or the northernly stickleback, is a marine species, from 1 to 2 inches long, of very slender elongate form, with a tubular snout. They are among the most characteristic fishes of the northern hemisphere in the colder regions. Except in the breeding season, they live in shoals, and are sometimes numerous enough to become of commercial value for their oil or for manure. They are noted for the construction of elaborate nests which the male builds for the eggs, in which several females often or generally deposit their burden. The eggs are comparatively few, and while being hatched are assiduously guarded by the male. The local or popular synonyms of the sticklebacks are numerous, among them prickleback, sprickleback, stickling, and sharpfin.

Stygted with the stíward, stad in the halle.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 90.

stigma¹ (stig'mä), n.; E. pl. stigmas (stig'mäz), used chiefly in senses 1, 2, and 6; L. pl. stigmata (stig'mä-tä), used more or less in all the senses. [= F. stigmate = Sp. Pg. estigma = It. stimate, stigma = G. stigma, < NL. stigma, < L. stigma, < Gr. στίγμα, pl. στίγματα, a mark, esp. of a pointed instrument, a spot, brand, < στίχειν, mark (with a point), prick, brand: see *stick*¹.] 1. A mark made with a red-hot iron, formerly in many countries upon criminals as a badge of infamy; a brand impressed on slaves and others.

The Devil, however, does not imprint any stigma upon his new vassal, as in the later stories of witch-compacts.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 95.

2. Any mark of infamy, slur, or disgrace which attaches to a person on account of evil conduct.

Happy is it for him that the blackest stigma that can be fastened upon him is that his robes were whiter than his brethren's.
Ep. Hall, Remains, Pref.

3. In anat. and zool., a mark; a marked point or place: variously applied to marks of color, as a spot, and to many different pores or small holes. Specifically—(a) A birth-mark; a nevus. (b) The point or place on the surface of an ovary where a mature Graafian follicle ruptures. (c) In ornith., the place where the calyx or ovisac of the ovary ruptures to discharge an ovum into the oviduct. See calyx, 3 (b). (d) In entom.: (1) The exterior orifice of a trachea; a spiracle. See cuts under pulmonary, flesh-fly, sheep-bot, and Acarida. (2) A chitinous spot or mark on the anterior margin of the fore wings of many insects, formed by a special enlargement of a vein; a pterostigma. (e) In Protozoa, a spot of pigment; the so-called eye of an infusorian. (f) In Annelida, one of the pores or openings of the segmental organs. (g) In Hydrozoa, the pore by which a pneumatocyst opens to the exterior. See cut under Hydrozoa. (h) In Pharyngopneusta, as an ascidian, one of the ciliated openings by which the cavity of the pharynx is placed in communication with that of the atrial canal. See cuts under Appendicularia and Tunicata.

4. A place or point on the skin which bleeds periodically or at irregular intervals during some mental states. The spontaneous appearance of stigmata was formerly regarded superstitiously. — 5. pl. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., marks said to have been supernaturally impressed upon the bodies of certain persons in imitation of the wounds on the crucified body of Christ.

In the life of St. Francis of Assisi we have the first example of the alleged miraculous infliction of stigmata.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 549.

6. In bot., a modified part of the style or, when that is wanting, of the surface of the ovary, which in impregnation receives the pollen. In the latter case the stigma is said to be sessile, as in the poppy and the tulip. When the style is present, the stigma may be terminal, occupying its summit, as in the plum and cherry, or lateral, running down its face in one or two lines, as in Ranunculus. Its form and appearance are very various. In many plants there is only one stigma, while in others there are two, three, five, or many, according to the number of styles or style-branches. The stigma is composed of delicate cellular tissue; its surface is destitute of true epidermis, and is usually moist. See pistil (with cut) and pollen-tube.

Stigmata.

stigma² (stig'mä), n. [Gr. στίγμα, the ligature σ, an altered form, to bring in σ, of σίγμα or σίγμα, the letter σ, sigma: see sigma.] The ligature was also called στί. In Gr. gram. and paleog., a ligature (σ) still sometimes used for σ (st), and also used as a numeral (6).

stigma-disk (stig'mä-disk), n. In bot., a disk forming the seat of a stigma, sometimes produced by the fusion of two or more style-apices, as in Asclepias.

stigmatal (stig'mäl), a. [*< stigma*¹ + -al]. Of or pertaining to a stigma; stigmatic. Specifically applied in entomology to a vein of the wings of some insects, whose modification makes a stigma (pterostigma).

Stigmata (stig-mä-rí-ä), n. [NL. < L. stigma, a mark (see *stigma*¹), + -aria]. A former genus of fossil plants, very abundant in many regions in the coal-measures, and especially in the under-clay, or clayey material (often mixed with more or less sand) by which most seams of coal are underlain; also [l. c.], a plant of this genus. These plants are cylindrical root-like bodies, usually starting from a center in four main branches, and afterward bifurcating irregularly, and extending sometimes to great distances. The bodies are covered with small round depressions or scars arranged in lozenge-shaped patterns, and each the point of attachment of a ribbon-shaped filament or rootlet. In some cases the stigmata have been found attached to trunks of Sinilaria, in such a position as would naturally be occupied by the roots with reference to the stem of the plant or tree; hence they have been admitted by most paleobotanists to be in fact the roots of the widely distrib-

... called Stigmara. Some who maintain this, however, assert that the relation of the stigmara to the plant itself was peculiar; while others believe that they were floating stems, able under favorable conditions to play the part of roots. This opinion has for its support the fact that thick beds of under-clay are frequently found almost entirely made up of remains of stigmara, which, even a fragment of Stigmara can be found in the vicinity.

Stigmara (stig-mā'ri-an), a. [< Stigmara + -ia] Relating to, containing, or consisting of Stigmara. [Geol. Mag., No. 267, p. 407.

stigmarioid (stig-mā'ri-oid), a. [< Stigmara + -oid.] In bot., resembling Stigmara.

stigmata, n. Latin plural of *stigma*¹.

stigmatal (stig'ma-tal), a. [< stigma + -al.] In entom., pertaining to, near, or containing the stigmata or breathing-pores; stigmatic: as, the stigmatal line of a caterpillar.

stigmatic (stig-mat'ik, formerly also stig-mat'ik), a. and n. [*< ML. stigmaticus, < L. stigma, < Gr. στίγμα, a mark, brand: see stigma*¹.] I. a. Of or pertaining to a stigma, in any sense of that word. Specifically—(a) Having the character of a brand; ignominious.

Print in my face
The most stigmatic title of a villain.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, II. 110).

(b) Marked with or as with a stigma or brand; repulsive; abhorrent.

So the world is become ill favoured and shrewd-pated, as politic in brain as it is stigmatic in limbs.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 19.
(c) In nat. hist., belonging to or having the character of a stigma; stigmatic. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 374. (d) In bot., receptive of pollen: said of parts of the style which have the function without the form of a stigma, as the "silk" of maize. (e) Bearing the stigmata; stigmatized. See *stigma*¹. — Stigmatic cells, in bot., same as lenticels.

II. n. 1. A person who is marked with stigmata, in the ecclesiastical or the pathological sense; a stigmatist. — 2. A criminal who has been branded; one who bears upon his person the marks of infamy or punishment; a notorious profligate.

Convaide him to a justice, where one swore
He had been branded stigmatic before.

Phantomthe (1616). (Nares.)
3. One on whom nature has set a mark of deformity.

But like a foul, mis-shapen stigmatic,
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 136.

(= Lg. stelling = G. stelling, a stand, scaffold; cf. Icel. stelling, management), < still + -ing.] 1. A stand for casks.—2. In a brewery, a stand on which the rounds or cleansing-vats are placed in a trough, which serves to carry off the overflowing yeast.—3. A stand on which pottery is placed in the drying-kiln preparatory to firing.

Stillingia (sti-lin'ji-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), named after Benjamin Stillingfleet, an English botanist who published botanical papers in 1759.] 1. A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Euphorbiaceae, tribe Crotoneae, and subtribe Hippomaneae. It is characterized by monocious flowers in terminal bracted spikes, each bract bearing two glands —the male flowers having a small calyx with two or three broad shallow lobes, and two or rarely three free exerted stamens, and the female flowers bearing an ovary of two or three cells, which terminate in undivided styles united at the base, and ripen into two-valved carpels which on falling leave the receptacle armed with three hard spreading horns. There are about 13 species, natives of North and South America, the Mascarene Islands, and the islands of the Pacific. They are mostly smooth shrubs, usually with alternate short-petioled leaves and a few small female flowers solitary under the lower bracts of the dense sterile spike, which bears usually three male flowers under each of the short and broad upper bracts. One species, S. sylvatica, occurs from Virginia southward, for which see queen's-delight and silver-teal.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the above genus, especially the official S. sylvatica.

stillion (stil'yōn), n. Same as stilling. G. Seacell, Breweries and Maltings, p. 92.

stillitory, n. An erroneous spelling of stillatory.

still-life, n. See still life, under *still*¹.

still-liquor (stil'lik'or), n. Bleaching-liquor prepared by the reaction of hydrochloric acid upon manganese binoxid in large stone chambers called stills (whence the name). It is a solution of manganese chlorid.

stillness (stil'nes), n. [< ME. stilnesse, < AS. stlness, stlness (= OFries. stlness, stlness = MLG. stilnisse = OHG. stilnissi, stlnessi, MHG. stilnisse, stlness), < still, still: see *still*¹ and -ness.] The state or character of being still.

(a) Rest; motionlessness; calmness: as, the stillness of the air or of the sea. (b) Noiselessness; quiet; silence: as, the stillness of the night. (c) Freedom from agitation or excitement: as, the stillness of the passions. (d) Habitual silence; taciturnity.

*still-peering*¹ (stil'pēr'ing), a. Appearing still.

O you leaden messengers,

That ride upon the violent speed of fire,

Fly with false aim; move the still-peering air,

That sings with piercing.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 2. 113.

[A doubtful word, by some read still-piercing.]

still-room (stil'rōm), n. 1. An apartment for distilling; a domestic laboratory.—2. A room connected with the kitchen, where coffee, tea, and the like are made, and the finer articles supplied to the table are made, stored, and prepared for use. [Eng.] still-stand (stil'stand), n. A standstill; a halt; a stop. [Rare.]

The tide swell'd up unto his height,

That makes a still-stand, running neither way.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 3. 64.

still-watcher (stil'woch'er), n. In distilling, a reservoir in which the density of the liquid given over is tested by a hydrometer in order to follow the progress of the distillation.

stilly (stil'i), a. [< ME. stillych, < AS. stillyc (= MLG. stillich, stilik); as *still*¹ + -ly.] Still; quiet.

containing them, and recondensing them into the liquid form. It assumes many forms, according to the purposes for which it is used; but it consists essentially of two parts, a vessel in which the substance to be distilled is heated, and one in which the vapor is cooled and condensed. The most important use of stills is for the distillation of spirituous liquors. See distillation, and cut under petroleum-still.

2. A house or works in which liquors are distilled; a distillery. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 15.—

3. In bleaching, a rectangular vessel made of slabs of freestone or flagstone with rabbeted and stemmed joints held together by long bolts, and provided with a steam-chamber below, and with a manhole for introducing the materials for making chlorid of manganese solution, called still-liquor.

stillage (stil'āj), n. [Origin uncertain.] A stout support, in the nature of a stool, for keeping something from coming in contact with the floor of a shop, factory, bleachery, etc. Specifically—(a) In bleaching, a stout low stool or bench to keep textiles or yarns from the floor, and to permit the moisture to drain out of them. (b) In the packing of cloths and other goods for shipment, etc., a stool or bench for supporting the goods taken out of a stock to be packed. Some Verily she was heled, and left her styltes there,

And on her fete went home reasonably well.

Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

I have laughed a-good to see the cripples Go limping home to Christendom on stilts.

Marlowe, Jew of Malta, ii. 3. 215.

2. One of two props or poles, each having a step or stirrup at some distance from the lower end, by means of which one may walk with the feet raised from the ground, and with a longer stride: used for crossing sandy or marshy places, streams, etc., and by children for amusement. Stilts were sometimes merely props fastened under the feet, as if very high-heeled shoes. Those used by children are slender poles about 6 feet long, with steps or stirrups 12 inches or more from one end; the longer end of the pole can be held by the hand or passed behind the arm. In a modified form the upper end of the pole is much shorter, and is fitted with a cross-handle which can be grasped by the hand, or is strapped to the leg below the knee. Stilts are used by the shepherds of the marshy Landes in southwestern France.

In ceram., a support, generally of iron, used to hold a piece of pottery in the kiln, to allow the fire free access to the bottom of the piece. Also called cockspur and spur (which see).—6. [Abbr. of stilt-bird.] In ornith., any bird of the genus Himantopus: so called from the extremely long, slender legs. The bill is likewise very slender, straight, and sharp. The body is slender, the neck long, the wings are long and pointed, and the tail is short. The stilts are wading-birds living in marshes. They are white below, with most of the upper parts glossy-black, the bill is black, and the legs are of some bright tint. They are very generally distributed over the world, nest on the ground, and lay four dark-colored, heavily spotted eggs. Their food consists of small soft animals found in the mud and water, which they explore with their probe-like bills. The common stilt of the Old World is H. candidus or melanopus; that of the United States is H. mexicanus, a rare bird in the eastern regions of the country, but abundant in some parts of the west. It is about 15 inches long, and 30 in extent of wings; the bill 2½ inches; the legs, from the feathers to the toes, 7½ inches. There are only three toes, which are semipalmated. This species is locally called tonashanks and bucyer. The South American stilt is H. mariscollis; the Australian, H. leucophaea. A related bird of Australia to which the name extends is Cladorhynchus leucophaea, having the toes webbed like those of the avocet. Stilt prolegs, in entom., the prolegs of a caterpillar when they are unusually long, so that the body over them is much raised above the surface on which the insect walks.

stilt (stilt), v. t. [< stilt, n.] To raise above the ordinary or normal position or surface, as if by the use of stilts.

The stilt columns of Sam Moise are stilted upon pedestals, and their lines are broken by the bands which encircle them like broad barrel hoops.

Houdon, Venetian Life, xviii.

stilt-bird (stilt'berd), n. 1. The stilt or stilt-plover.—2. pl. Wading birds collectively; the grallatorial birds, constituting the old order Gruiformes or Grallatores. stilt-petrel (stilt'pet'rel), n. A stormy petrel of the genus Fregata: so called from the length of the legs. F. grallaria is an example.

stilt-plover (stilt'pluv'ēr), n. The stilt or stilt-bird: so called because it has only three toes on each foot, like a plover.

stilt-sandpiper (stilt'sand'pī-pēr), n. A long-legged sandpiper of America, Micropalama himantopus. The adult in summer is blackish above, with each feather edged and tipped with white, or tawny and bay; the under parts are mixed reddish, whitish, and black in streaks on the throat, elsewhere in bars; the ear-coverts are chestnut, the upper tail-coverts white with dusky bars, and the bill and feet greenish-black. The length is 8½ inches, the extent 16½. The young and the adults in winter are quite different, being ashy-gray above, with little or no trace of the reddish and black; a line over the eye and the whole under parts are white; and the jugulum and sides are suffused with ashy, and streaked with dusky. The bird inhabits North America, breeding in high latitudes, and migrating in the fall to Central and South America. See cut under Micropalama.

stilt-walker (stilt'wā'kēr), n. 1. One who walks on stilts. Amer. Nat., Nov., 1889, p. 943. —2. A grallatorial bird; a stilt-bird.

stimulant (stim'ū-lant), a. and n. [= F. stimulant = Sp. Pg. estimulante = It. stimolante, < L. stimulan(t)-s, ppr. of stimulare, prick, urge, stimulate: see stimulate.] 1. a. Stimulating; serving to stimulate, incite, or provoke; specifically, in physiol., temporarily quickening some functional or trophic process.—Stimulant balsam, a mixture of oil of turpentine 8 parts and flour mustard 1 part.

II. n. 1. That which stimulates, provokes, or incites; a stimulus; a spur.

The stimulant used to attract at first must be not only continued, but heightened to keep up the attraction.

Mrs. H. More, Celebs, xxv.

2. In physiol., an agent which temporarily quickens some functional or trophic process. It may act directly on the tissue concerned, or may excite the nerves which effect the process or paralyze the nerves which inhibit it. Stimulants comprise certain medicinal substances, as ammonia, alcohol, ethylic ether, as well as physical conditions, such as warmth, cold, light, or electricity, esthetic effects, as music and other products of art, and emotions of various kinds, as joy, hope, etc. Stimulants have been divided into general and topical, according as they affect directly or indirectly the whole system or only a particular part.—Diffusible stimulants, those stimulants, as ether or ammonia, which have a speedy and quickly transient effect.

stimulate (stim'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. stimulated, ppr. stimulating. [< L. stimulatus, pp. of stimulare (> It. stimolare = Sp. To prick; goad; excite, rouse, or animate to action or more vigorous exertion by some effective motive or by persuasion; spur on; incite.

The general must stimulate the mind of his soldiers to the perception that they are men, and the enemy is no more.

Emerson, Courage.

Mystery in nature stimulates inquiry; why should it not do so in religion?

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 149.

2. In physiol., to quicken temporarily some functional or trophic process in.—3. Specifically, to affect by the use of intoxicating drinks.

We were all slightly stimulated [with arrack] before a move was made toward the dinner table.

O'Donovan, Merv, xi.

Stimulating bath, a bath containing aromatic astringent or tonic ingredients.—Syn. 1. To encourage, impel, urge, instigate, provoke, whet, foment, kindle, stir up.

II. intrans. To act as a stimulant.

Urg'd by the stimulating goad,

I drag the cumbrous waggon's load.

Gay, To a Poor Man, l. 87.

stimulation (stim'ū-lā'shōn), n. [= F. stimulation = Sp. estimulación = Pg. estimulação = It. stimolazione, < L. stimulatio(n)-, a pricking, incitement, < stimulare, prick, goad, stimulate: see stimulate.] 1. The act of stimulating, or the state of being stimulated; urging; encouragement; incitement; increased or quickened action or activity.

The providential stimulations and excitations of the conscience. Ep. Ward, Sermon, Jan. 30, 1674. (Latham.)

A certain length of stimulation seems demanded by the inertia of the nerve-substance.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 648.

2. In med., the act or method of stimulating; the condition of being stimulated; the effect of the use of stimulants.

The latent morbid predisposition [to delirium tremens] engendered in the nervous system by prolonged and abnormal stimulation is evoked or brought into activity by the depressing influence of the shock [of a corporeal injury].

J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 153.

=Syn. 1. See stimulate. stimulative (stim'ū-lā-tiv), a. and n. [= It. stimulativo; as stimulate + -iv.] I. a. Having the quality of stimulating; tending to stimulate.

II. n. That which stimulates; that which rouses into more vigorous action; a stimulant or incentive.

Then there are so many stimulatives to such a spirit as mine in this affair, besides love!

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, l. 225. (Davies.)

stimulator (stim'ū-lā-tōr), n. [= F. stimulateur = It. stimolatore, < LL. stimulator, an instigator, < L. stimulare, prick, goad: see stimulate.] One who or that which stimulates.

stimulatress (stim'ū-lā-tres), n. [= F. stimulatrice = It. stimolatrice, < L. stimulatrix, fem. of (LL.) stimulator: see stimulator.] A woman who stimulates or animates.

stimulose (stim'ū-lōs), a. [< F. stimuleux = It. stimoloso, < L. stimulosus, abounding with prickles, < stimulus, a prick, goad, prickle: see stimulus.] In bot., covered with stings or stimuli.

Literally, a goad.—2. In bot., a sting; as, the nettle is furnished with stimuli.—3. The point at the end of a crozier, pastoral staff, precentor's staff, or the like. In the staves of ecclesiastical authority the stimulus or point is regarded as the emblem of judgment or punishment.

4. Something that excites or rouses the mind or spirits; something that incites to action or exertion; an incitement or incentive.

We went to dine last Thursday with Mr. . . . a neighboring clergyman, a haunch of venison being the stimulus to the invitation. Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vi.

The infinitely complex organizations of commerce have grown up under the stimulus of certain desires existing in each of us. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 28.

5. In physiol., something which evokes some functional or trophic reaction in the tissues on which it acts.

Light does not act as a stimulus to the nervous substance, either fibres or cells, unless it have an intensity which is nearly deadly to that substance.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 179.

Absolute stimulus difference, in psychophysics, the actual difference in strength between two stimuli. Relative stimulus difference, in psychophysics, the ratio of the difference between two stimuli to their mean. Stimulus receptivity, in psychophysics, the power of appreciating stimuli, measured by the least intensity of stimulus giving the greatest conscious effect. Stimulus scope, in psychophysics, the difference between the measure of stimulus receptivity and the stimulus threshold. Stimulus susceptibility, in psychophysics, the power of perceiving a stimulus, so that the greater the stimulus susceptibility the lower the stimulus threshold. Stimulus threshold, in psychophysics, the minimum amount of stimulus required to produce a conscious effect.

stimy (sti'mi), n. In golf, the position of a ball when it is directly between the hole for which an adversary is playing and his ball.

stimy (sti'mi), v. t. In golf, to hinder by a stimy.

stinch, v. t. [A var. of stanch.] To stanch.

Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 553.

2†. To impale.

He stingeth him upon his speres orde.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 645.

3. To prick severely; give acute pain to by piercing with a sharp point; especially, to pierce and wound with any sharp-pointed weapon supplied with acrid or poisonous fluid, as a fang or sting, with which certain animals and plants are furnished; bite; urticate: as, to be stung by a bee, a scorpion, or a nettle, or by a serpent or a sea-nettle.

I often have been stung too with curst bees.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

4. To pain acutely, as if with a sting; goad: as, a conscience stung with remorse.

Unhappy Psyche, stung by these reproaches, Profundly feels the wound dive in her heart.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, v. 14.

5. To stimulate; goad.

She was trying to task herself up to her duty. At last she stung herself into its performance by a suspicion.

Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xxxviii.

II. intrans. 1. To have a sting; be capable of wounding with a sting; use the sting: literally or figuratively: as, hornets sting; epigrams often sting; a stinging blow.

At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

Prov. xliii. 32.

2. To give pain or smart; be sharply painful; smart: as, the wound stung for an hour.

Under the dust, beneath the grass,
Deep in dim death, where no thought stings.

A. C. Swinburne, Félise.

sting¹ (sting), n. [= Icel. stingi, a pin, a stitch in the side, = Sw. sting, a sting (in sense 4), = Dan. sting, stitch; from the verb.] 1. A sharp-pointed organ of certain insects and other animals, capable of inflicting by puncture a painful wound.

I bring no tales nor flatteries; in my tongue, sir,

I carry no fork'd stings. Fletcher, Loyal Subject, ii. 1.

In zool., specifically—(a) The modified ovipositor of the females of certain insects, as bees, wasps, hornets, and many other Hymenoptera; an aculeus; a terebra. This weapon is generally so constructed as to inflict a poisoned as well as punctured wound, which may become inflamed and very painful or even dangerous; an irritating fluid is injected through the tubular sting when the thrust is given. See cut under Hymenoptera. (b) The mouth-parts of various insects which are formed for piercing and sucking, as in the mosquito and other gnats or midges, gadflies, fleas, bedbugs, etc. In these cases the wound is often poisoned. See cuts under gnat and mosquito. (c) A stinging hair or spine of the larvæ of various moths, or such organs collectively. See cuts under hag-moth, saddleback, and stinging. (d) The fangs of spiders, with which these creatures bite—in some cases, as of the katipo or malmignatte, inflicting a very serious or even fatal wound. See cuts under chelicera and fang. (e) The curved or claw-like telson of the tail of a scorpion, inflicting a serious poisoned wound. See cuts under scorpion and Scorpionida. (f) One of the feet or claws of centipedes, which, in the case of some of the larger kinds, of tropical countries, inflict painful and dangerous wounds. (g) The poison-fang or venom-tooth of a noxious serpent; also, in popular misapprehension, the harmless soft forked tongue of any serpent. See cuts under Crotalus and snake. (h) A fin-spine of some fishes, capable of wounding. In a few cases such spines are connected with a venom-gland whence poison is injected; in others, as the tail-spines of sting-rays, the large bony sting, several inches long and sometimes jagged, is smeared with a substance which may cause a wound to fester. See cuts under stone-cat, sting-ray. (i) An urticating organ, or such organs collectively, of the jellyfishes, sea-nettles, or other celerates. See cut under nematocyst.

2. In bot., a sort of sharp-pointed hollow hair, seated upon or connected with a gland which secretes an acrid or poisonous fluid, which, when introduced under the skin, produces a stinging pain. For plants armed with such stings, see cowhage, *nettle*¹ (with cut), nettle-tree, 2, and tried-sofly.—3. The fine taper of a dog's tail. Sportsman's Gazetteer.—4. The operation or effect of a sting; the act of stinging; the usually poisoned punctured wound made by a sting; also, the pain or smart of such a wound.

Their softest touch as smart as lizards' stings!

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 325.

5. Anything, or that in anything, which gives acute pain, or constitutes the principal pain; also, anything which goads to action: as, the sting of hunger; the stings of remorse; the stings of reproach.

The sting of death is sin.

1 Cor. xv. 56.

Whose sting is sharper than the sword's.

Shak., W. T., ii. 3. 86.

A bitter jest leaves a sting behind it.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 77.

6. Mental pain inflicted, as by a biting or cutting remark or sarcasm; hence, the point of an epigram.

There is nothing harder to forgive than the sting of an epigram.

O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LXVI. 667.

7. A stimulus, irritation, or incitement; a netting or goading; an impulse.

The wanton stings and motions of the sense.

Shak., M. for M., i. 4. 59.

Exserted sting. See exserted.

sting² (sting), n. [Also stemy; a var. of *stang*¹.]

1†. A pole.—2†. A pike; a spear.—3. An instrument for thatching.—4. The mast of a vessel. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch in all uses.]

stiony, n. See stony.

Stipa (sti'pä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), named from the flaxen appearance of the feathery awns of S. pennata; < L. stipa, stipa, stipula, the coarse part of flax, tow; see stupa.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Agrostideæ, type of the subtribe Stipeæ. It is characterized by one-flowered panicle spikelets, with their pedicels not continued beyond the flower, which contains three or perhaps sometimes only two lodicules and a narrow acuminate flowering glume indurated closely around the grain and prolonged, usually by a joint, into a long and commonly conspicuously twisted or bent awn. There are nearly 100 species, widely dispersed through both tropical and temperate regions. They are tufted grasses, usually tall, with convolute leaves and a slender, sparingly branched panicle of rather long scattered spikelets, with awns sometimes extremely attenuated. A general name of the species is feather-grass, applying particularly to the highly ornamental S. pennata of Europe. The only common species of the eastern United States is S. avenacea, the black oat-grass; westward the species are numerous—several, known as bunch-beard, or feather-grass, being somewhat valuable wild forage-plants of the mountains and great plains. Among these are S. comata (silk-grass) and S. spartea (porcupine-grass), the latter remarkable for its hygrometric awns, which are coiled when dry, but uncoil under moisture and, when resisted, tend to push the seed into the ground. S. viridula, var. robusta, of Mexico, New Mexico, etc., is reported to have a narcotic effect upon horses, and is called sleepy-grass. S. aristatum of Australia is a valuable fodder-plant, of remarkably rapid growth; S. micrantha of Queensland borrows the name of bamboo. S. tenacissima and S. arenaria, on account of their large membranous spikelets and two-cleft flowering glume, are sometimes separated as a genus, Macrochloa (Kunth, 1835). See esparto, alfa, and atocha-grass.

stipate (sti'pät), a. [< L. stipatus, pp. of stipare, crowd, press together. Cf. constipate.] In bot., crowded.

stirrup (stir' or stér'up), n. [Early mod. E. also stirrop, stirope, sterope; < ME. stirrop, styrope, sterope, < AS. stirāp, stigrāp, stigerāp (= MD. stegerep, steeghreep, also stegelreep = OHG. stegereif, MHG. G. stegreif = Icel. stigrēip), lit. 'mounting-rope,' < stigan, mount, + rāp, rope: see *styl*¹ and ropel. Cf. D. stijg-beugel = G. st eig-bügel = Sw. st ig-bygel = Dan. st ig-bøjle, a stirrup, lit. a ring or loop for mounting (see bail).] 1. A support for the foot of a person mounted on a horse, usually a metal loop with the bottom part flat and corrugated or finished with points to give a hold to the sole of the boot and to aid in mounting. The metal loop is suspended from the saddle by a strap or thong, which in modern saddles is adjustable in length. The stirrup of Arab or other Eastern horsemen has a very broad rest for the foot; this projects sometimes beyond the heel, and the sharp edge of it serves instead of a spur. The stirrups of some modern military saddles have a strong front piece of leather or other material which prevents the foot from passing too far into the loop and protects the front of the leg. See also cut under saddle.

Our hosts upon his stirrups stood anon.

Chaucer, Prol. to Shipman's Tale, I. 1.

I'll hold your stirrup when you do alight,
And without grudging wait till you return.

Beau. and FL., Honest Man's Fortune, iv. 1.

2. Naut., a rope with an eye at its end, through which a foot-rope is rove, and by which it is supported. The ends of stirrups are securely fastened to the yard, and they steady the men when reefing or furling sails.

in course of construction or preparation.—14. That part of the tally which the creditor took away as evidence of the king's debt, the part retained in the Exchequer being called the counterstock. See tally.

It was the custom when money was borrowed for State purposes to record the transaction by means of notches on a stick (commonly hazel), and then to split the stick through the notches. The lender took one half as a proof of his claim against the Exchequer, and it was called his Stock. The Exchequer kept the other half, which was called the counterstock, and which answered the same purpose as was served in after-times by the counterfoil.

Bithell, Counting-House Dict., p. 290.

15. In finance: (a) The money represented by this tally; money lent to a government, or a fund consisting of a capital debt due by a government to individual holders who receive a fixed rate of interest. In modern usage, especially in Great Britain, the name is applied to a capital of which payment cannot be claimed, but on which interest is paid in perpetuity at a given rate; hence, to buy stock is simply to buy the right to this interest on a certain amount of this capital debt—a right which may be sold again. The various kinds of stocks are called the public funds. See *fund*¹, n., 2.

I have known a Captain rise to a Colonel in two days by the fall of stocks.

Steele, quoted in Ashton's Reign of Queen Anne, II. 206.

The term Stock was originally applied to the material sign and proof of money lent. But as the thing signified was of greater importance to both parties than the sign, it was at length transferred to the money itself, or rather to the right to claim it. In this way Stock came to be understood as money lent to the government, and eventually to any public body whatever.

Bithell, Counting-House Dict., p. 290.

(b) The share capital of a corporation or commercial company; the fund employed in the carrying on of some business or enterprise, divided into shares of equal amount, and owned by individuals who jointly form a corporation; in the plural, shares: as, bank stock; railway stock; stocks and bonds.—16. The property which a merchant, a tradesman, or a company has invested in any business, including merchandise, money, and credits; more particularly, the goods which a merchant or a commercial house keeps on hand for the supply of customers.

Who trades without a stock has naught to fear. Cibber.

"We must renew our stock, Cousin Hepzibah!" cried the little saleswoman. "The gingerbread figures are all gone, and so are those Dutch wooden milkmaids, and most of our other playthings."

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, v.

17. Fund; sum of money.

Mr. John Whitson being Mayor, with his brethren the Aldermen, and most of the Merchants of the Citty of Bristol, raised a stock of 1000*l.* to furnish out two Barks.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 108.

It's proverbial He gave them an alms-penny, for which reason Judas carried the bag that had a common stock in it for the poor.

Barnard, Heylin, § 104.

The money is raised out of the interest of a stock formerly made up by the nobility and gentry.

Butcher, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 103.

18. Hoard or accumulation; store; supply; fund which may be drawn upon as occasion demands: as, to lay in a stock of provisions; a stock of information.

Though all my stock of tears were spent already Upon Pisanò's loss.

He set up as a Surgeon upon his bare natural stock of knowledge, and his experience in Kibes. But then he had a very great stock of confidence withal, to help out the other.

A great stock of parliamentary knowledge.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

19. Share; portion.

Whilst we, like younger Brothers, get at best But a small stock, and must work out the rest.

Therefore nothing would satisfy him [a young prodigal] unless he were intrusted with the Stock which was intended for him, that he might shew the difference between his Father's Conduct and his own.

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, III. i.

20. Ground; reason; evidence; proof.

He pities our infirmities, and strikes off much of the account upon that stock.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 914.

21. The part of a pack of cards which in certain games is not dealt out, but left on the table, to be drawn from as occasion requires.

Nay, then, I must buy the stock; send me good cards! I hope the prince's hand be not in this sport.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iv. 1.

22. In agri.: (a) The horses, cattle, sheep, and other useful animals raised or kept on a farm or ranch: distinctively known as live stock: as, a farmer's land and stock. The term is extended to any animals, as fish or oysters, artificially propagated.

stock was produced, pipes lighted, and conversation resumed. —The great stock Australian subject. —stock. A. C. Grant, Bush Life in Queensland, I. 141.

(1) The implements of husbandry stored for use. —Also called dead stock. —23. The raw material from which anything is made; stuff; material: as, paper-stock (rags, fiber, wood-pulp, etc.); soap-stock.

Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 350.

24. The liquor or broth prepared by boiling meat, with or without vegetables, etc., so as to extract the nutritious properties, and used as a foundation for different kinds of soup. Also called soup-stock. —25. A good kind of red and gray brick, used for the exterior of walls and the front of buildings. —26. A name of several cruciferous garden-flowers. (a) One of several species of Matthiola, or sometimes the species in general. Originally stock-pilgflower. (b) By extension, the somewhat similar Malcolma maritima, the Mahon stock, a low diffuse annual, in England called Virginia or virgin stock, though from the shores of the Mediterranean. The name has been applied also to the genus Helleborus.

27. A covering for the leg: a stocking. Compare with with with.

A linen stock on one leg, and a kersey boot-hose on the other. Shak., T. of the S., iii. 2. 67.

28. In her., the stump of a tree used as a bearing: represented as cut square on top and eradicated—that is, torn up by the roots—with at least the main roots indicated. —29. (a) The pillar or post on which the holy-water vessel was fixed. E. Peacock. Hence—(b) A holy-water vessel, or aspersorium.

Item. one hollywater stocke of glassey by ayle. Inventory 34, Henry VIII.

30. The proceeds of the sale of the catch of a fishing-trip; the net value of a cargo of fish. [New Eng.] —31. pl. A frame in which a horse or other animal can be secured or slung for shoeing or for a veterinary operation. —32. In mining, sometimes used as the equivalent of the German stock (plural stöcke), especially in translating from that language. A "stock" is a mass of ore of irregular form, but usually thick in proportion to its other dimensions, and not having the characters of a true vein, but belonging more properly to the class of segregated veins or masses. Some "stocke" resemble very nearly the "carbonas" of the Cornish miner; others are akin to the "flats" of the north of England.

33. In early forms of feudalism, commendation. See to accept stock, below. —34. In zool., a compound, colonial, or aggregate organism; an aggregate of persons forming one organic whole, which may grow by budding or cast off parts to start a new set of persons: as, a polyp-stock. A polypidom, a polyzoary, a chain of salps or doliolids, etc., are examples. Haeckel extends stock in this sense to the broader biological conception which includes those plants that propagate by buds or shoots. See teetology. —Dead stock. See def. 22. —Drop of stock. See drop. —Fancy stocks. See fancy. —Holy-water stock, a vessel for holy water; a holy-water stoup. See water. —Live stock. See def. 22. —Lock, stock, and barrel. See lock. —Long of stock. Steele, Tender Husband, ii. 1.

stock-jobbery (stok'job'ér-i), n. The practice or business of dealing in stocks or shares.

stock-jobbing (stok'job'ing), n. The business of dealing in stocks or shares; the purchase and sale of stocks, bonds, etc., as carried on by jobbers who operate on their own account.

stockless (stok'les), a. Without a stock: as, stockless anchors; stockless guns.

stock-list (stok'list), n. A list, published daily or periodically in connection with a stock-exchange, enumerating the leading stocks dealt in, the prices current, the actual transactions, etc.

stockman (stok'man), n.; pl. stockmen (-men).

1. A man who has charge of the stock in an establishment of any kind.—2. A stock-farmer or rancher.—3. A man employed by a stock-farmer as a herdsman or the like. [U. S. and Australia.]

stock-market (stok'mär'ket), n. 1. A market where stocks are bought and sold; a stock-exchange.—2. The purchase and sale of stocks or shares: as, the stock-market was dull.—3. A cattle-market.

stock-morel (stok'mor'el), n. A fungus, Morchella esculenta. See *morel*², Morchella.

stock-owl (stok'oul), n. The great eagle-owl of Europe, Bubo ignavus.

stock-pot (stok'pot), n. A pot in which soup-stock is prepared and kept ready for use.

stock-printer (stok'prin'tér), n. An instrument for automatically printing stock quotations transmitted by telegraph; a stock-indicator.

stock-pump (stok'pump), n. A pump which, by means of levers, is operated by the weight of an animal as it walks on the platform of the pump, seeking water.

stock-punished (stok'pun'isht), a. Punished by being confined in the stocks. Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 140.

stock-purse (stok'pørs), n. A fund used for the common purposes of any association or gathering of persons.

stock-raiser (stok'rā'zér), n. One who raises cattle and horses; a stock-farmer.

stock-ranch (stok'rānch), n. A stock-farm. [Western U. S.]

stock-range (stok'rānj), n. A tract or extent of country over which live stock (especially cattle) range. [Western U. S.]

stock-rider (stok'ri-dér), n. A man employed as a herdsman on an unfenced station in Australia.

Now and afterwards I found out that he was a native of the colony, a very great stock-rider, and was principal overseer to Mr. Charles Morton.

H. Kingsley, Hillyars and Burtons, xlviii.

stock-room (stok'rōm), n. A room in which is kept a reserved stock of materials or goods ready for use or sale.

stocks (stoks), n. pl. See *stock*¹, 12.

stock-saddle (stok'sad'l), n. A saddle used in the western United States, an improvement of the old Spanish and Mexican saddle. Its peculiarity is its heavy tree and iron horn, made to withstand a strong strain from a rope or reata.

For a long spell of such work a stock-saddle is far less tiring than the ordinary Eastern or English one, and in every way superior to it.

T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 863.

stock-station (stok'stā'shon), n. A ranch or stock-farm. [Australia.]

stock-still (stok'stil'), a. Still as a stock or fixed post; perfectly still.

If he begins a digression, from that moment, I observe, his whole work stands stock-still.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, i. 22.

stock-stone (stok'stōn), n. A scouring-stone used in the stretching and smoothing of leather before currying.

stock-tackle (stok'tak'l), n. A tackle used in handling an anchor and rousing it up to secure it for sea: usually called a stock-and-bill tackle.

stock-taking (stok'tā'king), n. See to take stock, under *stock*¹.

stock-train (stok'trān), n. A train of cars carrying cattle; a cattle-train. [U. S.]

stock-whaup (stok'hwāp), n. The curlew, Numenius arquata; the whaup.

stockwork (stok'werk), n. [*stock*¹ + work; tr. G. stockwerk.] In mining, that kind of ore-deposit in which the ore is pretty generally or uniformly distributed through a large mass of rock, so that the excavations are not limited to a certain narrow zone, as they are in the case of an ordinary fissure-vein. This mode of occurrence is almost exclusively limited to, and very characteristic of, stanniferous deposits, and the word is used especially in describing those of the Erzgebirge. Also called stockwerk (the German name).

The name of interlaced masses, or stockworks, is given to masses of igneous rock penetrated by a great number of little veins of metallic ores which cross in various ways. Callon, Mining (tr. by Le Neve Foster and Galloway), i. 47.

The stockwerk consists of a series of small veins, interlacing with each other and ramifying through a certain portion of the rock.

J. D. Whitney, Met. Wealth of the U. S., p. 39.

stocky (stok'i), a. [*stock*¹ + -y.] (cf. stogy.) 1. Short and stout; stumpy; stock-like.

They had no titles of honour among them but such as denoted some bodily strength or perfection: as, such a one "the tall," such a one "the stocky," such a one "the gruff."
Addison, Spectator, No. 433.

2. In zool., of stout or thick-set form; stout-bodied.—3. In bot., having a strong, stout stem, not spindling.

Stocky plants, vigorous, and growing rapidly, are better than simply early plants. Science, XIV. 364.

4. Headstrong; stubborn. [Prov. Eng.]

stock-yard (stok'yārd), n. An inclosure connected with a railroad, or a slaughter-house, or a market, etc., for the distribution, sorting, sale, or temporary keeping of cattle, swine, sheep, and horses. Such yards are often of great size, and are arranged with pens, sheds, stables, conveniences for feeding, etc.

stodgy (stoj'i), a. [Assibilated form of stogy, ult. of stocky.] 1. Heavy; lumpy; distended. [Colloq., Eng.]

"Maggie," said Tom, . . . "you don't know what I've got in my pockets." . . . "No," said Maggie. "How stodgy they look, Tom! Is it marls or cobnuts?"
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 5.

2. Crammed together roughly; lumpy; crude and indigestible. [Colloq., Eng.]

The book has too much the character of a stodgy summary of facts. Saturday Rev.

3. Wet; miry. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

stoechiology, stoechiometrical, etc. Same as stoeicheiology, etc.

stog (stog), v.; pret. and pp. stogged, ppr. stogging. [stock, n.; ult. a var. of *stock*¹, v. Cf. stodge, v.] 1. To plunge a stick down through (the soil), in order to ascertain its depth; probe (a pool or marsh) with a pole. [Scotch.]—2. To plunge and fix in mire; stall in mud; mire. [Colloq., Eng.]

It was among the ways of good Queen Bess, Who ruled as well as mortal ever can, Sir, When she was stogged d, and the country in a mess, She was wont to send for a Devon man, sir.

West Country song, quoted in Kingsley's Westward Ho, x.

Roman Woman Clad in the Stola
(over which is draped the palla).

2 (c). This genus has been often called Engraulis. See cut under anchovy.

stolid (stol'id), a. [= Sp. estólido = Pg. estolido = It. stolido, < L. stolidus, unmovable, slow, dull, stupid; prob. akin to Gr. στερεός.] Heavy; dull; stupid; not easily moved; lacking in or destitute of susceptibility; denoting dullness or impassiveness: as, a stolid person; a stolid appearance.

But the stolid calm of the Indian alone Remains where the trace of emotion has been.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, i.

=Syn. Doltish, wooden.

stolidity (stō-lid'i-ti), n. [= It. stolidità, < LL. stoliditas (-t-s), dullness, stupidity, < L. stolidus, dull, stupid: see stolid.] The state or character of being stolid; dullness; stupidity.

These certainly are the fools in the text, indocile, intractable fools, whose stolidity can baffle all arguments, and be proof against demonstration itself.

Bentley, Sermons, i.

=Syn. See stolid.

stolidly (stō-lid-li), adv. In a stolid manner: as, to gaze stolidly at one. Bailey.

stolidness (stō-lid-nes), n. Stolidity.

stolo (stō'lō), n.; pl. stolones (stō-lō'nēz). [L.: see stolon.] In zool., a stolon.—Stolo prolifer, the proliferating stolon of some animals, as certain ascidians; a germ-stock. See stolon, 2 (c).

stolon (stō'lon), n. [NL., < L. stolon (-n), a shoot, branch, sucker.] 1. In bot.: (a) In phanerogams, a reclined or prostrate branch which strikes root at the tip, developing a new plant.

Carex vulgaris, var. stolonifera, showing the stolons.

A very slender naked stolon with a bud at the end constitutes a runner, as of the strawberry. See also cut under Solidago. (b) In mosses, a shoot running along or under the ground, and eventually rising into the air and producing fully leafed shoots. Goebel.—2. In zool., some proliferated part or structure, likened to the stolon of a plant, connecting different parts or persons of a compound or complex organism, and usually giving rise to new zooids by the process of budding. See cuts under Campanularia and Willsia. (a) A process of protoplasm between the different compartments of a multilocular foraminifer. (b) The prominent, adherent, or creeping basal section of the stock of some social infusorians. (c) One of the prolongations of the cenosarc of some actinozoans. (d) The second stage of the embryo of some hydrozoans. (e) The germ-stock or prolongation of the tunica of some compound ascidians, as a salp; a stolo prolifer. See cuts under Salpa and Cyathozoid.

Also stole.

stolonate (stō'lon-āt), a. [(< stolon + -ate).] In zool., giving rise to or provided with a stolon or stolons; originating in a stolon; stoloniferous.

stoloniferous (stō-lō-nif'e-rus), a. [(< L. stolonifera), a shoot, sucker, + ferre, bear, carry: see -ferous.] Producing or bearing stolons; proliferating, as an ascidian or a hydroid; stolonate.

stolzite (stol'zit), n. [Named after Dr. Stolz of Teplitz in Bohemia.] Native lead tungstate, a mineral occurring in tetragonal crystals of a green, brown, or red color, and resinous or subadamantine luster. Sometimes called scheelite.

stoma (stō'mā), n.; pl. stomata (-ma-tā). [NL., < Gr. στόμα (stoma), pl. στόματα, the mouth, a mouth, opening, entrance or outlet, a chasm, cleft, etc., the face, front, fore part, etc.; = Zend staman, mouth. Cf. stomach, from the same source.] 1. In zool., a mouth or ingestive opening; an oral orifice; an ostium or ostiole: chiefly used of small or simple apertures, as a cytostome; hence, also, a small opening of any kind through which something may pass in or out; a pore. Specifically—(a) An opening of a lymphatic vessel; a lymphatic pore or orifice, as an interstice between the cells of a serous membrane. (b) The outer opening of a trachea or air-tube of an insect; a spiracle or breathing-hole. (c) A branchial pore of an ascidian or acranial vertebrate.

2. In bot., a minute orifice or slit in the epidermis of leaves, etc., which opens directly into air-cavities or intercellular spaces that pervade the interior, and through which free ingress and egress of air take place; a breathing-pore. The apparatus of the stoma consists usually of a pair of cells (there are several in the Equisetaceae, Hepaticae, etc.), called guard-cells or guardian-cells, between the opposed concave sides of which lies the slit or opening, which extends through the whole height of the epidermis and permits free communication between the intercellular spaces and the external air. According to Van Tieghem, the stomata are always open in sunlight and closed in darkness.

These cells are strongly thickened on the upper and under walls of their opposed faces, while elsewhere their walls are relatively thin. The opening and closing of a stoma depend upon the difference in thickness of the parts of the walls. When the turgescence of the guard-cells increases, they curve more strongly, and consequently the cleft widens; but with decreased turgescence the cleft becomes narrower. See also cut under Iris.

3. In Swedenborg's philosophy, a cubical figure with hollowed surfaces, being the figure of the interstices of spheres arranged in what Swedenborg calls the fixed quadrilateral pyramidal position, supposed to be that natural to the spherical particles of water.

stomaceae (stō-mak'a-sē), n. [NL., < L. stomachus, < Gr. στόμαχος, a disease of the mouth, scurvy of the gums, < στόμα, mouth, + κάκη, badness, < κακός, bad.] Ulcerous stomatitis. See stomatitis.

stomach (stum'ak), n. [Now conformed terminally to the L. spelling, but pron. according to its ME. origin; early mod. E. stomack, stomacke, stomak, stomake; < ME. stomak, stomake, stomoke, < OF. estomac, estomach, F. estomac = Pr. estomach = Sp. estómago = Pg. estomago = It. stomaco, the stomach, < L. stomachus, the throat, gullet, also the stomach, fig. taste, liking, also distaste, dislike, irritation, chagrin, < Gr. στόμαχος, the throat, gullet, the orifice of the stomach, hence also the stomach, lit. (as shown also in other uses, the neck of the bladder or of the uterus, etc.) a mouth or opening, < στόμα, mouth, opening: see stoma.] 1†. The throat; the gullet; the mouth.

Spiteful tongues in cankered stomachs placed.

Raleigh. (Imp. Dict.)

2. A more or less sac-like part of the body where food is digested. In the lowest animals any part of the sarcode or protoplasmic substance of the body is capable of digesting food, and forms during the process a temporary stomach, as in an amoeba. In many infusorial animalcules special vacuoles containing food are formed. These are inconstant both in number and in position, whence Ehrenberg's name, Polygastrica, for these organisms. In the highest protozoans, which have a definite oral or ingestive area, there is likewise a more or less fixed digestive tract, constituting a stomach. A few of the metazoans have no true digestion, and consequently no stomach; such are the parenchymatous or anenterous worms, which imbibe or soak in nutriment already elaborated in the tissues of the host of which they are parasites. But the vast majority of animals above the protozoans have an intestinal digestive tract the whole or a part of which may properly be called a stomach. In most of these, again, a definite stomach exists as a specialized, usually dilated, part of the alimentary canal, in which food is subjected to a certain degree of digestion subsequent to mastication and insalivation and prior to further digestive changes which go on in the intestine. Among vertebrates more than one section of the alimentary canal is called a stomach, and many vertebrates have more than one. Thus, in birds there are a true glandular stomach, the proventriculus, in which the esophagus ends, and a muscular or grinding stomach, the gizzard or gizzardum. In mammals the stomach always extends from the end of the gullet to the beginning of the gut. It is of extremely variable size and shape. Kinds of mammalian stomachs sometimes distinguished are the simple, as in man, the carnivores, etc.; the complex or plurilocular stomach, as in various marsupials, rodents, some monkeys, etc.; and the compound or pluripartite. The last is confined to the ruminants. (See Ruminantia.) In man the stomach is the most dilated and most distensible part of the alimentary canal. It occupies parts of the left hypochondriac and epigastric regions of the abdomen, immediately within the abdominal walls, below the diaphragm and partly under the liver, to the right of the spleen, and above the transverse colon. In form it is irregularly conoidal, and curved upon itself. When moderately distended, it is about 12 inches long and 4 wide; it weighs 3 or 4 ounces. But the size, shape, and hence the anatomical relations, vary greatly in different individuals and in different states of distention. It begins where the gullet ends, at the esophageal or cardiac orifice, and ends at the pyloric orifice, where the duodenum begins. From the cardiac orifice the stomach bulges to the left in a great cul-de-sac, the fundus cardiacus, or cardiac end, in contact with the spleen, and from this greatest caliber the organ lessens in diameter with a sweep to the right. The lesser curvature or short border of the stomach, between the cardiac and pyloric orifices, is uppermost, and is connected with the liver by the lesser or gastrophrenic omentum. The greater curvature or long border of the stomach is opposite the other, between the same two points, and gives attachment to the great or gastrosplenic omentum. These two curvatures separate the anterior and posterior surfaces. The stomach is held in place by folds of peritoneum, the gastrosplenic, gastrophrenic, gastrosplenic, and gastrophrenic omenta, the last of which gives it most fixity. The arteries of the stomach are the gastric (a branch from the celiac axis), the pyloric and right gastro-epiploic branches of the hepatic, the left gastro-epiploic, and short branches from the splenic artery. The veins end in the splenic, superior mesenteric, and portal veins. The numerous lymphatics consist of a deep set and a superficial set. The nerves are the terminal branches of both pneumogastrics and many branches from the sympathetic system. The coats of the stomach are four—serous, muscular, submucous, and mucous. The serous layer is the peritoneum, which covers the whole organ on both its surfaces, and is reflected away from it along each of its curvatures. The muscular coat includes three sets of fibers—longitudinal, circular, and oblique, the last chiefly limited to the cardia. The submucous coat is simply the connective tissue between the muscular layer and the mucous membrane lining the stomach. This mucous membrane is the so-called "coat" of the stomach. It is thick, pinkish, reddish, or brownish, with a soft velvety surface, thrown into longitudinal folds or rugae when the organ is contracted. Studying the surface of the mucous membrane are numberless depressions or alveoli of polygonal tending to hexagonal form, $\frac{1}{16}$ to $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch in diameter; these are the enlarged mouths of the tubular gastric glands, which secrete the gastric juice by the action of which gastric digestion is effected. Two kinds of these follicles are distinguished by their microscopic structure—the pyloric and the cardiac. The former are found chiefly at and near the pyloric end, the latter most typical at the cardiac, and there are intermediate forms in intermediate regions. The epithelium lining the mucous membrane and its alveoli is of the kind called columnar. Besides the four coats above described, a fifth, a layer of involuntary muscular fibers between the mucous membrane and the submucous layer, is distinguished as the muscularis mucosae. The digestive activity of the stomach is intermittent, and depends upon the stimulus which the presence of food occasions. The muscular arrangement is such that food is continually rolled about, so that every part of the mass is submitted to the action of the gastric juice. In the stomach the proteids are converted into albumins and peptones by the pepsin, milk is curdled by the rennet-ferment, the gelatiniferous tissues are dissolved, and other less important changes are effected. See also cuts under Alimentary, Asteroides, Appendicularia, Dibranchiata, Doliolidae, intestine, peritomeum, Plumatella, pluteus, Protella, Pulmonata, Pycnogonida, Ruminantia, Salpa, Tragulus, and Tunicata.

3. The digestive person or alimentary zooid of a compound polyp. See gasterozoid.—4. In most insects of the orders Lepidoptera, Diptera, and some Hymenoptera, a bladder-like expansion of the esophagus, which can be dilated at the will of the insect; the sucking-stomach, by means of which the nectar of flowers or other liquid is sucked up, as water is drawn into a syringe. In mandibulate insects the ingluvis or crop takes the place of the sucking-stomach, and nearly all insects have two true stomachs, called proventriculus and ventriculus.

5. Appetite; desire or relish for food: as, to have a good stomach for one's meals.

The body is as so redy and penyble

To wake, that my stomak is destroyed.

Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 139.

Pray, seat you, lords; we'll bear you company,

But with small stomach to taste any food.

Beau. and Fl. (7), Faithful Friends, iii. 2.

I'll make as bold with your meat; for the froth has got me a good stomach.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 234.

In some countries, where men and women have good travelling stomachs, they begin with porridge, then they fall to capon, or so forth, but if capon come short of filling their bellies, to their porridge again, 'tis their only course.

Webster and Dekker, Northward Hoe, l. 1.

Hence—6. Relish; taste; inclination; liking: as, to have no stomach for controversy.

He also hath tolde me moche of hys stomake and tendre faver that he owythe to yow.

Paston Letters, III. 160.

Finding that the citizens had apparently no stomach for the fight, he removed his trophies, and took his departure.

Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 66.

—Ulcerous stomatitis, inflammation of the mucous membrane of the mouth-cavity, usually unilateral, resulting in the formation of multiple ulcers. Also called stomatitis, phlegmonous stomatitis, and putrid sore mouth.

stomatium (stō-mā-shi-um, n.; pl. stomatia (-i-)). [NL., dim. of stoma; see stoma.] A stoma.

Stomatoda (stō-mā-tō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + δαίμων, form.] Dujardin's name for the ciliate infusorians, regarded by him as the only animalcules with distinct stomata, or oral apertures; distinguished from Astomata, or the supposed mouthless flagellate infusorians.

stomatodæum (stō-mā-tō-dē-um, n.; pl. stomatodæa (-i-)). [NL.; see stomodæum.] Same as stomodæum. [Rare.]

The stomatodæum: a sac-like involution of the epidermis abutting against the mesenteron, spacious, and well marked on account of its dense pigmentation.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 171.

stomatode (stō-mā-tōd), a. and n. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + δαίμων, form.] I. a. Having a stoma or cytostome, as an infusorian; stomatophorous; or of pertaining to the Stomatoda.

As regards the classification of the Protozoa, a rough and useful division is into mouth-bearing or "stomatode" Protozoa, in which there is a distinct mouth, and mouthless or "astomatous" Protozoa.

H. A. Nicholson.

II. n. A member of the Stomatoda.

stomatodendron (stō-mā-tō-dēn'drōn, n.; pl. stomatodendra (-drā)). [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + δένδρον, a tree.] One of the dendritic branches of the Rhizostomidae, ending in minute polypites. Encyc. Dict.

stomatodynia (stō-mā-tō-dīn'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + δύσιν, pain.] Pain in the mouth.

stomatogastric (stō-mā-tō-gas'trik), a. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + γαστήρ, stomach; see gastric.] Of or pertaining to the mouth and stomach; applied to the set or system of visceral nerves which ramify upon the alimentary canal of many invertebrates. See figure and description.

Stomatogastric and other Visceral Nerves of Crayfish. Istia n. n. n. n. n.

a, esophagus; b, c, pharynx; d, lachrymal gland; e, pharyngeal ring; f, cardiac plexus; g, pyloric plexus; h, a, cerebrogastrointestinal commissural nerve of left side, in place; b', commissural nerve of right side, cut away and turned down these longitudinal commissures being completed in the esophageal ring by c, postesophageal transverse commissure; d, f, lachrymal nerve, with a, a ganglion; e, lateral branch, joining with g, a posterolateral nerve; c, f, anterolateral and mediolateral nerves; h, hepatic nerve.

The Crayfish possesses a remarkably well-developed system of visceral or stomatogastric nerves.

[Invert., p. 286.]

stomatological (stō-mā-tō-loj'i-kal), a. [< stomatolog-y + -ic-al.] Pertaining to stomatology.

stomatologist (stō-mā-tol'ō-jist), n. [< stomatolog-y + -ist.] One versed in stomatology.

stomatology (stō-mā-tol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + λογία, < λόγος, speak; see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning the mouth.

stomatomorphous (stō-mā-tō-mōr'fus), a. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + μορφή, form.] In bot., mouth-shaped.

stomatonecrosis (stō-mā-tō-nek-rō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + νεκρωσις, deadness; see necrosis.] Gangrenous stomatitis. See stomatitis and noma.

Stomatophora (stō-mā-tōf'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stomatophorus; see stomatophorous.] Protozoa which are provided with a mouth or its equivalent: a higher series of protozoans: same as Infusoria, 2: opposed to Lipostomata.

stomatophorous (stō-mā-tōf'ō-rus), a. [< NL. stomatophorus, < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + φέρω = E. bear.] Having a mouth or stoma; of or pertaining to the Stomatophora; not lipostomatous.

stomatoplastic (stō-mā-tō-plas'tik), a. [< stomatoplast-y + -ic.] Pertaining to stomatoplasty.

stomatoplasty (stō-mā-tō-plas'tī), n. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + πλαστικός, verbal adj. of πλασσειν, form, mold.] Plastic surgery of the mouth.

stomatopod (stō-mā-tō-pōd), a. and n. [< NL. stomatopus (-pod-), < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + ποδός = E. foot.] I. a. Having some of the legs close by the mouth, as a mantis-shrimp; or of pertaining to the Stomatopoda. Also stomatopodous, stomapodous.

II. n. A member of the Stomatopoda, in any sense.

Also stomapod.

Stomatopoda (stō-mā-tōp'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stomatopod (-pod-); see stomatopod.] An order of malacostracous podophthalmic crustaceans, to which various limbs have been assigned. (a) As constituted by Latreille in 1817, in the form Stomatopoda, the second order of Crustacea, the so-called sea-mantes, or gastropods, divided into two families, Unipeltata and Bipeltata, of which only the former are properly stomatopodous, the other being the so-called glass-crabs (Phyllosoma), or larval forms of other crustaceans. Hence—(b) An artificial order of the higher crustaceans, under which are included not only the Squilla or Stomatopoda proper, but also the Mysidæ or opossum-shrimps, and related forms, the Luciferidæ, etc. (c) Restricted by Huxley to the family Squillidæ. See cuts under mantis shrimp and Squillidæ.

Squilla, Gonodactylus, and Coronis appear to me to differ so widely and in such important structural peculiarities, not only from the Podophthalmia proper, but from all other Crustacea, as to require arrangement in a separate group, for which the title of Stomatopoda may well be retained.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 317.

stomatopodous (stō-mā-tōp'ō-dus), a. [< stomatopod + -ous.] Same as stomatopod.

Stomatopora (stō-mā-tōp'ō-rā), n. [NL. (Brown, 1835), < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + πόρος, pore; see pori.] Same as Antipora.

stomatoporoid (stō-mā-tōp'ō-roid), a. [< Stomatopora + -oid.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a coral of the genus Stomatopora. Geological Jour., XLV. iii. 566.

Stomatopterophora (stō-mā-tōp'te-rof'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + πτερόν, feather, + φέρω = E. bear.] In J. E. Gray's classification (1821), the fourth class of mollusks, divided into two orders, Pterobranchia and Dactylobranchia; the Pteropoda or pteropods.

stomatorrhagia (stō-mā-tō-rā'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + ρῥαγία, < ρῥήνναι, break, burst.] Hemorrhage from the mouth.

stomatoscope (stō-mā-tō-skōp), n. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + σκοπεῖν, view.] Any instrument for keeping the mouth open so as to permit the parts within to be inspected. Dungli- stomatotheca (stō-mā-tō-thē'kā), n.; pl. stomatothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + θήκη, box, chest.] In entom., the mouth-case, or that part of the integument of a pupa which covers the mouth.

stomatous (stō-mā-tus), a. [< Gr. στόμα (-τ-), mouth, + -ous.] Provided with stomata; stomatophorous; stomate.

Stomias (stō-mi-as), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. στόμα, mouth.] A genus of deep-sea fishes, typical of the family Stomiidae, having a long compressed body with delicate deciduous scales, a row of phosphorescent or luminous spots along each side, and a rayed dorsal opposite the anal fin: so called from the large and deep mouth, armed with a formidable array of teeth. S. ferox is found from Greenland to Cape Cod. Specimens are taken at various depths from 450 to 1,800 fathoms.

Stomiidae (stō-mi-at'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stomias (see stomioid) + -idae.] A family of physostomous fishes, typified by the genus Stomias. They are deep-sea Atlantic fishes, of 5 or 6 species and 3 genera, divided into 2 subfamilies, according to the presence or absence of an adipose fin.

stomioid (stō-mi-a-toid), a. and n. [< Stomias (assumed stem Stomiat-).] I. a. Resembling a fish of the genus Stomias; of or pertaining to the Stomiidae.

II. n. Any fish of the family Stomiidae.

stomodæal (stō-mō-dē'al), a. Same as stomodæal.

stomodæum (stō-mō-dē-um, n.; pl. stomodæa (-ā)). [NL., < Gr. στόμα, mouth, + δαίμων, way.] The way, < δαίμων, way.] An anterior part of the alimentary canal or digestive tract, being so much of the whole enteric tube as is formed at the oral end by an ingrowth of the ectoderm: correlated with proctodæum, which is derived from the ectoderm at the aboral end, both being distinguished from enteron proper, which is of endodermal origin.

stomodeal (stō-mō-dē'al), a. [< stomodæum + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of a stomodæum. Also spelled stomodæal.

Stomoxys (stō-mok-sī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stomoxys + -idae.] A family of brachycerous dipterous insects, typified by the genus Stomoxys, often merged in the Muscidae. It contains such genera as Stomoxys, Haemaphys, and Glossina, and includes some well-known biting flies, as the horn-fly, stable-fly, and tsetse-fly. Also Stomoxys (Meigen, 1824) and Stomoxys (Westwood, 1840), and as a subfamily of Muscidae, Stomoxysina or Stomoxysina.

Stomoxys (stō-mok'sis), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), < Gr. στόμα, mouth, + ξύς, sharp.] A notable genus of biting flies, typical of the family Stomoxysidae, or merged with the Muscidae. They are gray, of medium size, and resemble the common house-fly in appearance. The mouth-parts are developed into a horny proboscis. S. calcitrans, common to Europe and North America, is a familiar example. See stable-fly, 1.

stomp¹ (stomp), n. A dialectal form of stamp; specifically, in coal-mining, one of the plugs of wood driven into the roof of the level, to which are fastened the "lines" serving to direct the miner in his proper course; they may also be used as bench-marks. Gresley. [Midland coal-field, Eng.]

stomp², n. and v. An obsolete form of stamp.

stompers (stom'pērs), n. pl. A dialectal form of stampers. See stamp, 3.

stonage (stō'nāj), n. [< stone + -age.] A collection or heap of stones. Halliwel.

Would not everybody say to him, We know the stonage at Gilgal? Leslie (Nares.)

stond (stond), v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal form of stand.

stondent. An obsolete past participle of stand.

stone (stōn), n. and a. [Also E. dial. steane, steen, So. stane, stain; < ME. stoon, ston, stan, < AS. stān = OS. stēn = OFries. stēn = D. steen = MLG. stēn, LG. steen = OHG. MHG. G. stein = Icel. steinn = Sw. Dan. sten = Goth. stains, a stone; prob. akin to Obulg. stiena = Russ. stiena, a wall, and to Gr. στία, στειν, a stone. Hence *steen*¹, *steen*².] I. n. 1. A piece of rock of small or moderate size. The name rock is given to the aggregation of mineral matter of which the earth's crust is made up. A small piece or fragment of this rock is generally called a stone, and to this qualifying term is frequently added: as, cobble-stone or gravel-stone. See *rock*¹.

Lo, heere be stonys hard y-wrougte,
Make hereof breed.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

Are there no stones in heaven
But what serve for the thunder?

Shak., Othello, v. 2. 234.

He is not a man, but a block, a very stone.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 450.

2. The hard material of which rock consists: in contradistinction to metal, wood, etc.

Al hem to-dryven ase ston doth the glas.

Flemish Inheritance (Child's Ballads, VI. 270).

He made a harp of her breast-bone,
Whose sounds would melt a heart of stone.

The Cruel Sister (Child's Ballads, II. 236).

That we might see our own work out, and watch
The sandy footprint harden into stone.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

3. A piece of rock of a determined size, shape, or quality, or used for a defined purpose: as, a grindstone; a hearthstone; an altar-stone. Specifically—(a) A gun-flint.

About seauen of the clocke marched forward the light peeces of ordnance, with stone and powder.

Holinshead, Chron., III. 947.

(b) A gravestone; a monument or memorial tablet.

You shall shine more bright in these contents
Than unswept stone besmeared with sluttish time.

Shak., Sonnets, iv.

(c) A millstone. (d) In printing, an imposing-stone. (e) In glass-manuf., a flattening-stone.

4. A precious stone; a gem. See precious.

Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels.

Shak., Rich. III., i. 4. 27.

5. A small, hard, rounded object resembling a stone or pebble: as, a hail-stone; a gall-stone; an ear-stone. Specifically—(a) A calculus concretion in the kidney or urinary bladder or gall-bladder, etc.; hence, the disease arising from a calculus. (b) A testicle: generally in the plural. [Vulgar.] (c) The nut of a drupe or stone-fruit, or the hard covering inclosing the kernel, and itself inclosed by the pulpy pericarp, as in the peach, cherry, or plum. See drupe and endocarp (with cuts).

(d) A hard, compact mass; a lump or nugget.

Marvellous great stones of yron.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. 498.

6. The glass of a mirror; a mirror of crystal.

Lend me a looking glass:

If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,
Why, then she lives.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 262.

7. A common measure of weight in use throughout the northwest and central countries of Europe, but varying much in different countries. The English imperial standard stone is 14 pounds avoirdupois, and is commonly used in common use, varying with the article weighed: thus, the stone of butchers' meat or fish is 8 pounds, of cheese 16 pounds, of glass 5 pounds, of alum 13½ pounds, of hemp usually 32 pounds, though a statute of George II. made it 16 pounds, and one of Henry VIII. 20 pounds; of lead 12 pounds, though the statute of ponderibus makes it 15 pounds of 25 "shillings" each, equal to 14½ pounds avoirdupois. There were in the early part of the nineteenth century many local stones in use in England, but in the United States this unit is unknown. The stone of 14 pounds is not recognized in the statute of ponderibus, and first appears as a weight for wool. The old arithmetics call 14 pounds half a quarter, rather than to define it as pounds. The only stone in Great Britain now is that of 14 pounds.

And such yet no word how much more yn value yn a stone shall I syle my wolle.

Paston Letters, I, 155.

He was a pale ghost, my visitor, but solid flesh and bone; He was a Pale Alto! tall, his weight was twenty stone.

G. W. Hobbes, Nux Posternatena.

Alencon stone, pure rock-crystal cut in rose or brilliant form.

Amazonian or Amazon stone, see Amazonite.

Arkansas stone, a fine-grained whetstone found in Arkansas, and used to sharpen surgical and dental instruments.

Armenian stone, see Armenian.

Artificial stone, a material prepared for decorative and building purposes by consolidating sand with the aid of some chemical.

The best-known and most extensively used artificial stone is Ransome's, which is made by mixing sand with silicate of soda in a pug-mill, so as to form a plastic substance, which is then rolled or pressed into any desired form.

The articles as thus prepared are then immersed in a solution of calcium chloride, when double decomposition takes place, a calcium silicate being formed which firmly cements the particles of sand together, while the sodium chloride, the other product of the decomposition, is afterward removed by washing.

This material has been somewhat extensively used in England and elsewhere.

Other processes akin to this, but in which different chemicals were used, have also been patented in the United States, but the materials thus produced have not met with any extensive sale.

Beton or concrete has also been employed as a building material, to take the place of stone or brick, especially the "béton-Coignet," which is extensively used in and near Paris and elsewhere.

Beton and concrete, which are mixtures of sand, gravel, stone chippings, fragments of brick, etc., with common or hydraulic mortar or cement, are also frequently, but not correctly, designated artificial stone.

Ayr stone, a stone used for polishing marble and surfacing metals. The harder varieties are used as whetstones.

Also called water of Ayr.

Bath stone, a rock used extensively for building purposes in England, and especially near Bath (whence its name). It is a limestone, having an oolitic structure, and belonging to the Inferior Oolite, which lies directly upon the Lias, the lowest division of the Jurassic of Continental and American geologists.

Also called Bath oolite.

Beer stone, a hard sandy chalk stratum of small thickness, occurring westward of Seaton in Devonshire, England. It forms a part of the Lower Chalk, and contains Inoceramus mytiloides. This series of beds, not having a thickness of more than 10 feet, is only of local importance, but it has been quarried as a building-stone for many hundred years, and parts of Exeter Cathedral are built of it.

Bologna stone, or Bolognian stone, a variety of barite, or barium sulphate, found in roundish masses, composed of radiating fibers, first discovered near Bologna. It is phosphorescent in the dark after being heated to ignition, powdered, and exposed to the sun's light for some time.

Bristol stone, rock-crystal, or Bristol diamond, small round crystals of quartz, found in the Clifton limestone, near the city of Bristol in England.

Caen stone, the French equivalent of the English Bath oolite. It is a cream-colored building-stone, of excellent quality, got near Caen in Normandy. Although soft in the quarry, it is of fine texture and hardens by exposure, so as to become extremely durable.

Winchester and Canterbury cathedrals, Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster, and many churches are built of it. It is still frequently used in England.

Cambay stone, see carnelian.

Centurial stones, see centurial.

Ceylon stone, a dark-green, brown, or black spinel from Ceylon, also called ceylonite; the name is also given to other minerals or gems from Ceylon.

Channel-stone, see channel.

Charnwood Forest stone, an oilstone found only in Charnwood Forest in Leicestershire, England. It is one of the best substitutes for the Turkey oilstone, and is much used to give a fine edge to knives and other tools.

Cornish stone. Same as china-stone, 2.

Cornish stone is used for almost all English wares, both in the body and the glaze. Spens' Encyc. Manuf., p. 1560.

Crab's stones. Same as crab's eyes (which see, under crab). See also crabstone.

Crape stone, a trade-name for onyx of which the surface is cut in imitation of crape and colored a lusterless black. A similar article is made from artificial silicious compounds cast in molds.

Cut stone, hewn stone, or work in hewn stone; ashler. — Deaf as a stone. See deaf.

Dimension stone, ashler. — Drafted stone, ashler stone having a chisel-draft around the face, the part inside the draft being left rough.

Heracleian stone. See Heracleian.

Hewn stone, blocks of stone with faces dressed to shape by the hammer.

Holy stone, a stone used in magical rites, whether as a magic mirror or show-stone, or as a sort of amulet.

Infernal ledger, lithographic Lydian stone. See the adjectives.

Maltese stone, a limestone of a delicate brown cream-color, very compact, and almost as soft as chalk. The natives of the island of Malta turn and carve into various ornamental objects.

Memorial, meteoric, Moabite stone. See the adjectives.

Mocha stone (formerly also Moco stone; also Mocha-pebble; so called from Mocha in Arabia, where the stone is plentiful), a variety of dendritic agate, containing dark outlines of arborization, like vegetable filaments, due to the presence of metallic oxides, as of manganese and iron; moss-agate.

Philosopher's stone. See elixir, 1.

Portland stone, in England, a rock belonging to the Portlandian series; so named from the Isle of Portland, where it is typically developed. The Portlandian is a part of the Jurassic series, and lies between the Purbeckian, the highest member of that series, and the Kimmeridgian.

The Portland group, or Portlandian, consists of two divisions, the Portland stone and the Portland sand; the former has several subdivisions, to which local names are attached, such as curf, base-see, and whit-bee.

The Portland stone, which is a nearly pure carbonate of lime, is an important building-stone in England, and was extensively used by Inigo Jones and Sir Christopher Wren, in important public buildings, especially in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Precious stone. See precious.

Protean stone. See Protean.

Quarry-faced stone, cut stone of which the face is rough as it comes from the quarry, as distinguished from tooled, hammer-faced, pitch-faced stone, etc.

Rocking stone. See rock, 2.

Rosetta stone, a stele of tablet of black basalt, found in 1799 near Rosetta, a town of Egypt, on the delta of the Nile, by M. Boussard, a French officer of engineers. This stone bears a trilingual inscription, a decree of Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes) in Greek and Egyptian hieroglyphic and demotic. The inscription was deciphered chiefly by Champollion, and afforded the key to the interpretation of Egyptian hieroglyphics. The monument is now in the British Museum. — Rough-pointed stone. See rough, 1. — Rubbed stone, stone-work of which the surface is cut straight with the stone-saw, and afterward smoothed by rubbing with grit or sandstone. — Samian stone. See Samian. — Saracen's or Sarsen's stone. See Saracen. — Scotch stone. Same as Ayr stone. — Shipman's stone. See shipman. — Sonorous stone. See sonorous. — Standing stone. See standing. — Stick and stone. See stick, 3. — Stone cancer. Same as scirrhous cancer (which see, under scirrhous). — Stone of the second class. See elixir, 1. — Stones of sulphur. See sulphur. — To leave no stone unturned, to do everything that can be done; use all practicable means to effect an object; spare no exertions.

New crimes invented, left unturned'd no stone

To make my guilt appear, and hide his own.

Dryden, Æneid, ii, 133.

To mark with a white stone, to mark as particularly fortunate, favored, or esteemed. The phrase arose from the custom among the Romans of marking their lucky days on the calendar with a white stone (as a piece of chalk), while unlucky days were marked with charcoal. Brewer. — Syn. 1 and 2. See rock, 1.

II. a. 1. Made of stone: as, a stone house; a stone wall.

The lion on your old stone gates

Is not more cold to you than I.

Tennyson, Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

2. Made of stoneware: as, a stone jar; a stone mug.

Now mistress Gilpin (careful soul!)

Had two stone bottles found,

To hold the liquor that she loved,

And keep it safe and sound.

Cooper, John Gilpin.

Stone age. See archæological ages, under age. — Stone ax, an ax-head or hatchet-head made of hard stone. Such axes are found, belonging to prehistoric epochs, and have also been in use down to the present time among savage tribes in different parts of the world. Compare stone-ax. — Stone brick. See brick, 2. — Stone jug. See jug, 2. — Stone ocher. See ocher.

other, nearly as large, found in the Middle and Southern States. There are several more, a few inches long, all of fresh waters of the same country.

stone-centiped (stōn'sen'ti-ped), n. A centipede of the family Lithobiidae.

stonechacker (stōn'chak'ēr), n. Same as stonechat.

stonechat (stōn'chat), n. One of several different Old World chats, belonging to the genera Saxicola and (especially) Pratincola; a kind of bushchat: applied to three different English birds, and extended, as a book-name, to several others of the above genera. (a) Improperly, the wheatear, Saxicola oenanthe, and some other species of the restricted genus Saxicola. See cut under wheatear. [In this sense chiefly Scotch and American, the wheatear being the only bird of the kind which straggles to America.] (b) Improperly, the whin-buschat or whinchat, Pratincola rubetra. [Eng.] (c) The black-headed bushchat, Pratincola rubicola, a common bird of Great Britain and other parts of Europe. The true stonechat is about 5 inches long, the wing 2½, the tail scarcely 2. The male in full plumage has the head and most of the back black, the feathers of the back mostly edged with sandy brown; the upper tail-coverts white, varied with black and brown; the wings and tail blackish-brown, the former with a large white area on the coverts and inner secondaries; the sides of the neck and breast white; the rest of the under parts rufous-brown; the bill and feet black; and the eyes brown. It nests on the ground, and lays four to six bluish-green eggs clouded and spotted with reddish-brown. Also called chickadee, stonechacker, stonechatter, stoneclink, stonesnick, stonesnitch, or stonesmickle, and stonesmith.

The Stonechat closely resembles the Whinchat, . . . a circumstance which has caused much confusion; . . . for in almost all parts of England the Whinchat, by far the commonest species, popularly does duty for the Stonechat, and in many parts of Scotland the Wheatear is universally known by that name. See Bohm, Hist. Brit. Birds, I. 317.

stonechatter (stōn'chat'ēr), n. Same as stonechat.

stone-climber (stōn'kli'mēr), n. The dobson or hellgrammite. See cut under sprawler. [Local, U. S.]

stoneclink (stōn'klingk), n. Same as stonechat.

stone-clover (stōn'klō'vēr), n. The rabbit-foot or hare's-foot clover, Trifolium arvense, a low slender branching species with very silky heads, thence also called puss-clover. It is an Old World plant naturalized in America.

stone-coal (stōn'kōl), n. [= G. steinkohle; as stone + coal.] Mineral coal, or coal dug from the earth, as distinguished from charcoal: generally applied in England to any particularly hard variety of coal, and especially to that called in the United States anthracite. See coal.

stone-cold (stōn'kōld'), a. Cold as a stone. Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, iv. 4.

stone-color (stōn'kul'or), n. The color of stone; a grayish color.

stone-colored (stōn'kul'ord), a. Of the usual color of a large mass of stone, a cold bluish gray.

stone-coral (stōn'kor'al), n. Massive coral, as distinguished from branching coral, or tree-coral; hard, sclerodermatous or lithocoralline coral, as distinguished from sclerobasic coral. Most corals are of this character, and are hexacoralline (not, however, the red coral of commerce, which is related to the sea-fans and other octocorallines).

stonecrab (stōn'krab), n. 1. Any crab of the family Homolidae.—2. A European crab, Li- thodes maia.—3. A large, stout, edible crab of the Atlantic coast of the United States, Menippe mercenaria.—4. The dobson or hellgrammite. See cut under sprawler. [Local, U. S.]

stone-crawfish (stōn'krā'fish), n. A crawfish of Europe, specified as Astacus torrentium, in distinction from the common crawfish of that country, A. fluviatilis.

stone-cray (stōn'krā), n. A distemper in hawks. Imp. Dict.

stone-cricket (stōn'krik'et), n. One of the wingless forms of the orthopterous family Locustidae, living under or among stones and in dark places, and popularly confounded with true crickets (which belong to the orthopterous family Gryllidae or Achetidae). There are many species, of various parts of the world, some simply called crickets, and others cave-crickets. The commonest American stone-cricket belongs to the genus Ceuthophilus, as C. maculatus, etc. See cave-cricket, and cut under Hadenaeus.

stonecrop (stōn'krop), n. [< ME. stoncrop, < AS. stāncrop, stonecrop, < stān, stone, + crop, the top or head of a plant, a sprout, a bunch or cluster of flowers: see stone and crop.] The wall-pepper, Sedum acre: so called as frequently growing upon walls and rocks. It is native throughout Europe and Asiatic Russia, and somewhat employed in ornamental gardening; in America called moss, mossy stonecrop, etc., from its creeping and matting stems beset with small sessile leaves. The flowers are bright-yellow in small terminal cymes. The name is also extended to other species of similar habit, especially S. ternatum, and not seldom to the whole genus.—Ditch-stonecrop, a plant of the genus Penthorum, chiefly the American P. sedoides, a weed-like plant with yellowish-green flowers, common in ditches and wet places.—Great stonecrop, an old designation of the kidneywort, Cotyledon Umbilicus, also of Sedum album.—Mossy stonecrop. See def.

stone-runner (stōn'run'ēr), n. Same as stone-plover, 2 (b). [Prov. Eng.]

stone-saw (stōn'sā), n. A tool or a sawing-machine for cutting marble, millstones, and for cutting stones into slabs, disks, columns, and blocks, either from the live rock in the quarry or in a stone-yard. The most simple form of machine is a flat blade of iron strained tight in a saw-frame, and supported by two or four suitable mechanisms. The cutting is done by particles of sand continually supplied to the saw by means of a stream of water. Stone-saws of this type are usually arranged in gangs, the frame supporting a number of saws, and being suspended by chains over the block to be cut, the spaces between the blades regulating the thickness of the slabs. Circular saws have also been used to cut thin slabs of stone into narrow pieces by the agency of wet sand. An improvement on this method is the use of circular saws armed with black diamonds or carbon-points. The saw is placed in a frame resembling an iron-planer, the saw-arbor having a vertical motion; and the block of stone, dogged to a traversing table, is fed to the saw as the cut is made. Diamond stone-cutting machines have also been made in the form of reciprocating saws. In one new stone-sawing machine, called a channeling-machine, used to cut out large blocks and columns in a quarry, a circular saw having carbon-points is employed, the power being applied by means of gearing to the edge of the saw instead of at the arbor. Another form of quarrying stone-saw consists of an endless band of twisted wire rope passing in a horizontal direction over large pulleys, like a band-saw, and employing wet sand as the cutting-material.

stone-s-cast (stōnz'kást), n. Same as stone-cast.

stoneseed (stōn'sēd), n. A plant of the genus Lithospermum, particularly the gromwell, L. officinale and L. arrense. The name, as also that of the genus, refers to the hardness of the seeds.

Stonesfield slate. See *slate*2.

stone-shot (stōn'shot), n. The distance a stone can be thrown, either from a cannon or from a sling.

He show'd a tent stonesmickle (stōn'smik'1), n. Same as stone-chat (c). Also stonesmich, stonesmitch, stone-smith.

stone-snipe (stōn'snip), n. 1. The greater tell-tale, greater yellowshanks, or long-legged tattler, Totanus melanoleucus, a common North American bird of the family Scolopacidae. The length is from 13 to 14 inches, the extent 24; the bill is 2 or more inches long, the tarsus 24. The legs are chrome-yellow; the bill is greenish-black. The upper parts are dusky, speckled with whitish; the under parts are white, streaked on the jugulum, marked on the sides, flanks, and axillars with dusky bars and arrow-heads. The tail is barred with blackish and white. The stone-snipe inhabits North America at large, breeding in high latitudes, and is chiefly seen in the United States during the migrations and in winter. It is a noisy and restless denizen of marshes, bays, and estuaries. See cut under yellowlegs. 2. Same as stone-plover, 1. Encyc. Diet.

stone-sponge (stōn'spunj), n. A lithistidan sponge: so called from the hardness. See Lithistida.

stone-squarer (stōn'skwār'ēr), n. One who forms stones into square shapes; a stone-cutter.

stone-thrush (stōn'thrush), n. The mistle-thrush. [Prov. Eng.]

stone-toter (stōn'tō'tēr), n. 1. Same as stone-lugger, 1. Also toter. —2. A cyprinoid fish, Exoglossum maxilliguala: a cut-lips. [Local, U. S., in both senses.]

stone-walling (stōn'wā'ling), n. 1. The process of walling with stone; hence, walls built of stone. Encyc. Brit., II. x. 388. —2. Parliamentary obstruction by talking against time, raising technical objections, etc. [Australia.]

He is great at stone-walling tactics, and can talk against time by the hour.

Mrs. Campbell Praed, The Head Station, p. 35.

stoneware (stōn'wār), n. Potters' ware made from clay of very silicious nature, or a composition of clay and flint. The clay is beaten in water and purified, and the flint is calcined, ground, and suspended in water, and then mixed (in various proportions for various wares) with the clay. The mixture is then dried in a kiln until it is sufficiently solid to be kneaded, and is then beaten and tempered before being molded into shape. When fired it is not porous, like common pottery, but vitrified through its whole substance in consequence of the great amount of silex contained in the prepared clay. Vessels of stoneware are generally glazed by means of common salt. The salt, being thrown into the furnace, is volatilized by heat, becomes attached to the surface of the ware, and is decomposed, the muriatic acid flying off and leaving the soda behind it to form a fine thin glaze on the ware, which resists ordinary acids. The old German stoneware had often a vitreous glaze. See grès de Flandres, under grès, and Colomne ware, under *ware*2.

stoneweed (stōn'wēd), n. 1. Same as stone-seed. —2. The dooreweed, Polygonum ariculare. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

stonework (stōn'wērk), n. Work consisting of stone; masons' work of stone.—Broken-range stool-ball (stöl'bál), n. An outdoor game of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, generally played by women alone, but sometimes in company with men. See second quotation.

Daugh. Will you go with me?

Woer. What shall we do there, wench?

Daugh. Why, play at stool-ball.

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 2.

Stool-Ball. This game, so often mentioned in old writers, is still played in almost every village in Sussex, and is for ladies and girls exactly what cricket is to men. Two pieces of board 18 inches by 12 are fixed to two sticks from 3 to 4 feet high, according to the age of the players. These sticks are stuck in the ground sloping a little backwards, and from 10 to 15 yards apart. The players take sides, generally eight to ten each. . . . The bowler pitches the ball at the board, which in fact is the wicket. If he hits it the player is out. The same is the case if the ball is caught; and the running out, stumping, &c., are exactly like cricket.

N. and Q., 3d ser., XI. 457.

stool-end (stöl'end), n. In mining, a part of rock left unworked for the purpose of supporting the rest.

stool-pigeon (stöl'pij'on), n. 1. A pigeon fastened to a stool, and used as a decoy.

The Stool-Pigeon, also, as familiar to English ears as to ours, exists here—and even in the Eastern States—still in both its primary signification and its figurative extension. In the former it means the pigeon, with its eyes stitched up, fastened on a stool, which can be moved up and down by the hidden fowler, an action which causes the bird to flutter anxiously. This attracts the passing flocks of wild pigeons, which alight and are caught by a net, which may be sprung over them.

De Vere, Americanisms, p. 210.

Hence—2. A person employed as a decoy: as, a stool-pigeon for a gambling-house: such a fellow is generally a "rook" who pretends to be a "pigeon." See pigeon, 2, and rook, 1, 3.

The bendings, and the falls.

B. Jonson, Sejanus, i. 1.

His clumsy figure, which a great stoop in his shoulders, and a ludicrous habit he had of thrusting his head forward, by no means redeemed.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, ii.

2. The darting down of a bird on its prey; a swoop; a pounce.

Once a kite, hovering over the garden, made a stoop at me.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, ii. 5.

Hence—3†. That which stoops or swoops; a hawk. [Rare.]

You glorious martyrs, you illustrious stoops,

That once were cloister'd in your fleshy coops.

Quarles, Emblems, v. 10.

4. A descent from superiority, dignity, or power; a condescension, concession, or submission: as, a politic stoop.

This place [a Maronite convent] is famous for excellent wine, which they preserve, as they do in all these parts, in large earthen jars, close stopped down with clay.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 103.

3. To shut up; inclose; confine.

Forthi yf combes ronke of hony weep,

Three dayes stopped up atte home hem [bees] keep.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 138.

Whatever spirit . . . leaves the fair at large

Shall feel sharp vengeance soon o'ertake his sins,

Be stopp'd in vials, or transfix'd with pins.

Pope, R. of the L., ii. 126.

4. To hinder from progress or procedure; cause to cease moving, going, acting, working, or the like; impede; check; head off; arrest: as, to stop a car; to stop a ball; to stop a clock; to stop a thief.

"How dare you stop my errand?" he says;

"My orders you must obey."

Child Noryce (Child's Ballads, II. 41).

Did they exert themselves to help onward the great movement of the human race, or to stop it?

Macaulay, Sir J. Mackintosh.

5. To hold back, as from a specified course, purpose, end, or the like; restrain; hinder: followed by from (obsolete or dialectal of).

No man shall stop me of this boasting. 2 Cor. xi. 10.

Thus does he poison, kill, and slay, . . .

Yet stops me o' my lawfu' prey.

Burns, Death and Dr. Hornbook.

6. To prevent the continuance of; suppress; extinguish; bring to an end: as, to stop a leak.

Thei putten here bondes upon his mouthe, and stoppen his Brethe, and so thei sleen him.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 201.

If there be any love to my deservings

Borne by her virtuous self, I cannot stop it.

Beau. and FL., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 1.

7. To check or arrest by anticipation.

The grief . . . that stops his answer.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 1664.

Every bold sinner, when about to engage in the commission of any known sin, should . . . stop the execution of his purpose with this question: Do I believe that God has denounced death to such a practice, or do I not?

South. (Johnson.)

8. To keep back; withhold.

Do you mean to stop any of William's wages, about the sack he lost the other day at Hinkley fair?

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 1. 24.

Nor stops, for one had cork, his butler's pay.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. ii. 63.

9. To cease from; discontinue; bring to a stop.

When the crickets stopped their cry,
When the owls forlorn a term,
You heard music; that was I.
Browning, Serenade at the Villa.

10. In musical instruments: (a) Of the lute and viol classes, to press (a string) with the finger so as to shorten its vibrating length, and thus raise the pitch of the tone produced from it. (b) Of the wind group generally, to close (a finger-hole in the tube) so as to change the nodes of the vibrating column of air, and thus alter the pitch of the tone. (c) Of wind-instruments of the trumpet class, to insert the hand into (the bell) so as to shorten the length of the vibrating column of air, and thus to raise the pitch of the tone.—11. Naut., to make fast with a small line: as, to stop a line to a harpoon-staff.—12. To put the stops, or marks of punctuation, in; point, as a written composition; punctuate.

If his sentences were properly stopped.

London. (Imp. Brit.)

13. In masonry, plastering, etc., to point or dress over (an imperfect or damaged place in a wall) by covering it with cement or plaster.—14. In hort., same as stop.

After the end of July it is not advisable to continue the topping—technically stopping—of the young shoots.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 254.

15. To ward off; parry. [Pugilistic slang.]—A stopping oyster. See oyster.—Stopping the glass. See glass.—To stop a gap. See gap.—To stop a line. See line.—To stop down a lens, in photography, to reduce the amount of light admitted through a lens by using stops or diaphragms. See stop, n., 12.—To stop off. (a) In foundry, to fill in (a part of a mold) with sand to prevent metal from running into that part when the casting is made. The form of the casting can frequently be thus changed without the expense of altering a pattern or making a new pattern. (b) In galvanoplastic operations, to apply a varnish to (parts of a plate or object), to prevent the deposit of metal upon the varnished parts during immersion in the gilding or electroplating solution. To stop one's mouth, to silence one; especially, to silence one by a sop or bribe.

Let repentance stop your mouth;
Learn to redeem your fault.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 1.

If you would have her silent, stop her mouth with that ring.
Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, v. 1.

To stop out. (a) In the arts, to protect (a surface, etc.) from chemical or other action by covering with a coating: as, in photography, to cover with paint, paper, etc., as parts of a negative which are not to be printed; in electrotyping, to cover with wax, as parts of the black-leaded mold, to prevent the deposit of copper on those parts; in etching, to cover with a varnish or other resisting composition, as parts of a plate which are not to be bitten by the acid. (b) Theat., to cover (some of the teeth) with black wax, so as to make them invisible. = Syn. 1 and 4. To interrupt, block, blockade, barricade, intercept, end.—9. To suspend, intermit.

II. intrins. 1. To check one's self; leave off; desist; stay; halt; come to a stand or stop, as in walking, speaking, or any other action or procedure.

Why stops my lord? shall I not hear my task?
Shak., 3 Hen. VI. iii. 2. 52.

Terence . . . always judiciously stops short before he comes to the downright pathetic.
Goldsmith, Sentimental Comedy.

No rattling wheels stop short before these gates.
Cowper, Task, iv. 144.

2. To discontinue; come to an end; cease to be: as, the noise stopped; an annuity stops.—3. To make a halt or a stay of longer or shorter duration; tarry; remain.

We . . . went about half a mile to the east of Tortura, not designing to stop there.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 60.

Mr. Brontë and old Tabby went to bed. . . . But Charlotte . . . stopped up . . . till her weak eyes failed to read or to sew.
Mrs. Gaskell, Charlotte Brontë, II. 121.

"I would rather stop abed," said I: "what have I to do with fighting?"
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lxiv.

I've been up country some weeks, stopping with my mother.
S. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 17.

4. To intercept, ward off, or parry a blow. [Pugilistic slang.]

Don't stop with your head too frequently.
A. L. Gordon, In Utrunque Paratus.

To stop off or over, to make a brief or incidental stay at some point in the course of a journey; lie off or over: also used as a noun or an adjective: as, a stop-over check; the ticket allows a stop-off in Chicago. [Colloq.]—To stop out, to stay out all night, as in the streets, or away from one's proper lodging-place.

Mr. Hall, at Bow-street, only says, "Poor boy, let him go." But it's only when we've done nothink but stop out that he says that.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 563.

stop¹ (stop), n. [< stop, v.] 1. The act of stopping, in any sense. (a) A filling or closing up.

A breach that craves a quick expedient stop!

Shak., 2 Hen. VI. iii. 1. 288.

(b) An impeding or hindering; obstruction; stoppage.

What's he? One sent,
I feare, from my dead mother, to make stop
Of our intended voyage.
Brome, Antipodes, i. 7.

(c) A pause; a stand; a halt.

When he took leave now, he made a hundred stops,
Desir'd an hour, but half an hour, a minute.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 1.

Mrs. Crummles advancing with that stage walk which consists of a stride and a stop alternately.

Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xxv.

(d) Termination; ending.

How kingdoms sprung, and how they made their stop,
I well observed.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 49.

(e) A stay; a tarrying.

Coming to the Corner above Bethlehem Gate, [we] made a stop there, in order to expect the return of our Messenger.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 67.

2†. A state of hesitation or uncertainty; a standstill.

At which sudden question, Martius was a little at a stop.
Bacon, Holy War.

3. That which stops or hinders; especially, an obstacle or impediment; specifically, a weir.

He that is used to go forward, and findeth a stop, falleth out of his own favour.
Bacon, Empire (ed. 1887).

What they called stops . . . were in effect weirs or kideals.

Sir J. Hawkins, in Walton's Complete Angler, p. 274, note.

4. In musical instruments: (a) Of the lute and viol classes, a pressure on a string so as to shorten its vibrating length, and raise the pitch of its tone. (b) Of wind-instruments, the closing of a finger-hole in the tube so as to alter the pitch of its tone. (c) Of wind-instruments of the trumpet class, the inserting of the hand into the bell so as to raise the pitch of the tone.—5. Any lever or similar device for thus stopping a string or finger-hole.

His jesting spirit, which is now crept into a lute-string and now governed by stops.
Shak., Much Ado, iii. 2. 62.

In every instrument are all tunes to him that has the skill to find out the stops.
Brome, Sparagus Garden, iii. 4.

6. In an organ, a graduated set of pipes of the same kind, and giving tones of the same quality. A complete stop has at least one pipe for each digital of the keyboard to which it belongs; if a stop has less, it is called a partial stop; if more, it is called a compound stop or mixture stop. The number of pipes constituting a stop varies according to the compass of the keyboard to which it belongs, the usual number being now sixty-one for manual keyboards, and either twenty-seven or thirty for pedal keyboards, while mixture-stops have between twice and five times as many. Stops are variously classified, as follows: (a) As to general quality of tone, the principal qualities recognized being the organ-tone (as in the open diapason, the octave, the fifteenth, etc.), the flute-tone (as in the bourdon, the stopped diapason, the melodia, the flute, etc.), the string-tone (as in the viol da gamba, the violina, the dulciana, etc.), and the reed-tone (as in the oboe, the clarinet, the trumpet, etc.). The first three groups are also called five-stops, and the last, reed-stops, from the construction of their pipes (see pipe, 2). (b) As to the pitch of the tones relative to the digitals used, the two classes being foundation- and mutation stops, of which the former give tones exactly corresponding to the normal pitch of the digitals, while the latter give tones normal pitch that pitch by some fixed interval, like one, two, or three octaves, or even a twelfth. Foundation-stops of are usually called eight-foot stops, because the length of an open pipe sounding the second C below middle C is approximately eight feet; while for an analogous reason mutation-stops sounding an octave below the normal pitch of the digitals are called sixteen-foot stops; those sounding the octave above, four-foot stops; those sounding the second octave above, two-foot stops, etc. The specific names of stops are not only numerous, but often vary without sufficient reason. Some names have a merely technical significance, as diapason, principal, etc.; some indicate the instrument which they are intended to imitate, as flute, trumpet, clonocello, etc.; while others mark the extent of the mutation produced, as octave, twelfth, quint, etc. Each partial organ has its own stops, which can be sounded only by means of the digitals of its own keyboard. The pipes of a stop are usually arranged in a transverse row on the wind-chest, the order of them, and below plantation, varying somewhat. Under them, and between the upper and middle boards of the chest, is a movable strip of wood called a slider, which (together with able strip of wood called a slider, which (together with both these boards) is perforated with holes corresponding to the plantation of the pipes. The position of the slider is controlled through a system of levers by a handle near the keyboard called a register, stop-knob, or stop. When this handle is pulled out or drawn, the holes of the slider are coincident with those of the two boards, so that the air can pass freely from the pallets into the pipes; when the handle is pushed in, the holes of the slider are not coincident with those of the two boards, and communication between the pallets and the pipes is cut off. In the one case the stop is said to be "on," in the other "off." When the slider controlling the use of the upper pipes of a stop is separated from that controlling the use of the lower, the stop is called divided. Since the handles controlling the use of the pipes or stops proper are made of the same general shape as those controlling various mechanical appliances, like couplers, the former are also called sounding or speaking stops, in distinction from the latter, or mechanical stops, whose quality or power of tone is decidedly individual, so as to fit them for the performance of solo melodies, are called solo stops. See organ, reed-organ, pipe, etc.

The pathetic stop of Petrarch's poetical organ was one he could pull out at pleasure.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 368.

7. Same as stop-knob.—8. pl. In the harpsichord, handles controlling levers by which the position of the jacks could be varied so as to alter the force or quality of the tones produced.—9. A mark to indicate a stop or pause in reading; a mark of punctuation.

I can write fast and fair,
Most true orthography, and observe my stops.
Middleton, More Dissemblers besides Women, iii. 2.
Who walked so slowly, talked in such a hurry.
And with such wild contempt for stops and Lindley Murray!
C. S. Calverley, Isabel.

10. In joinery, one of the pieces of wood nailed on the frame of a door to form the recess or rebate into which the door shuts.—11. Naut.: (a) A projection at the head of a lower mast, supporting the trestletrees. (b) A bit of small line used to lash or fasten anything temporarily: as, hammock-stops, awning-stops.—12. In optics, a perforated diaphragm inserted between the two combinations of a double lens, or placed in front of a single lens, to intercept the extreme rays that disturb the perfection of the image. The practical effect of the stop is to increase the depth of the focus and sharpness of definition, but to diminish the illumination in the exact ratio of the diameter of the stop to that of the lens, and hence, in photography, to increase correspondingly the necessary time of exposure.

Microscopes, in which, whatever be the size of the lens itself, the greater portion of its surface is rendered ineffective by a stop.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 10.

13. In bookbinding, a small circular finishing-tool used by bookbinders to stop a line or fillet at its intersection with another line.—14. In lace-manuf. (in the application of the Jacquard attachment described under loom, 2, to a lace-frame), a point at which the different sets of warp-threads are concentrated or brought to a sort of focus, and which in the design of a pattern is taken as a basis for measurement in determining the distances the respective threads in the set must be moved to form the desired pattern. The movements of the mechanism are adjusted in accordance with these measurements.—15. In phonetics, an alphabetic sound involving a complete closure of the mouth-organs; a mute; a check.—16. The concavity of the profile of a dog's face, specially marked in the bulldog and pug.—17. In fencing, the action whereby a fencer, instead of parrying a blow and then thrusting, allows a careless opponent to run on his sword-point. He may hasten the stop by extending the sword-arm. (See stop-thrust.) The stop is discouraged in fencing as a game, since much use of it shortens the passages, and destroys combinations of feints, disengagements, coupes, etc.—Double stop.

See single stop.—Full stop. (a) A period. (b) In tele-playing: (1) A chord followed by a pause. (2) A chord in producing which all the strings are stopped by the fingers.

—Geneva stop. See Geneva movement, under movement.

—Half-stop, in an organ, a stop which contains half, or about half, the full number of stops.—Harmonic stop. See harmonic.—Incomplete or imperfect stop. See incomplete.—Open stop, in organ-building, a stop whose pipes are open at the upper end.—Pedal stop. See pedal.

—Service stop, in railroading, a stop made by a railway train in the regular way and at stations designated by the regulation schedule, as distinguished from an emergency stop.—Single stop, in ship-building, the scoring down of the carlines between the beams, by which means a ceiling is prevented from sinking any lower than its intended position. The double stop is generally used for deeper carlines than the single stop.—To hunt upon the stop, to hunt with or like a stop-hound—that is, slowly and with frequent pauses; hence, to be lukewarm.

If any [Christian] step a little forward, do not the rest hunt upon the stop!
Rev. S. Ward, Sermons, p. 91.

To put a stop to, to cause to stop, temporarily or permanently; break off; end.—Syn. 1. Stop, Cessation, Stay, Suspension, Intermission, Pause, Rest. These words may denote the failure or interruption of forward motion or of activity. Stop is an energetic word, but the most general: it is opposed to going forward or going on; cessation may be temporary or final, and is opposed to continuance; as, a stay is a stop viewed as a legal term, simply a stop: as, a stay in the place; or, as a legal term, simply a stop: as, a stay of proceedings; suspension is a suspension of work or pay; intermission is a strictly temporary stop; pause is a brief stop, in full expectation of going on; rest is a stop for refreshment from weariness.

stop² (stop), n. [< ME. stoppe, < AS. stoppa, a bucket or pail: see stoop².] A bucket; a pail; a small well-bucket; a milk-pail. Halliwell.

[Prov. Eng.]

stop³, n. A Middle English form of stoop².

stop-cock (stop'kok), n. A faucet with a valve of some form, operated by a handle: used to open or close a pipe or passage for water, gas, etc. Such cocks are sometimes made self-closing, to prevent waste.

stop-collar (stop'kol ă), n. In mach., an adjustable collar which can be placed and held to a set screw on a shaft or rod as a stop or to limit the motion of a movable part sliding on the rod or shaft, as a fitting on the main shaft on which the carriage of a typewriter slides, and adjustments in many other machines.

stop-cylinder (stop'sil'in-dér), n. In printing. See color-press and printing-machine.

stop-drill (stop'dril), n. A form of drill made with a solid shoulder, or admitting of the attachment of a collar by a side-screw, to limit the depth of penetration of the tool.

stopel (stöp), n. [*< ME. stope = MD. stoepe, etc., a step; or a var. of stape, stap, a step (cf. stopen, stope, stapen, pp. of steppen): see step, and cf. stoup.] An excavation made in a mine to remove the ore which has been rendered accessible by the shafts and drifts. These are, to a certain extent, permanent constructions, being carefully supported by the necessary timbering and left open for passage, while the stopes are only supported so far as may be necessary for the safety of the mine, and are more or less completely filled up with the attle or refuse rock left behind after the ore has been picked out and sent to the surface.

stopel (stöp), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. stoped, pp. stopping. [< stopel, n.] In mining, to remove the contents of a vein. The stoping is done after a vein or lode has been laid open by means of the necessary shafts and drifts. See stopping.

stope† (stöp), n. An obsolete form of stopel.

stope†, stopent. Middle English forms of stapen, past participle of step.

stop-finger (stop'fing'gér), n. Same as faller.

stop-gap (stop'gap), n. and a. [*< stop*¹, v., + obj. gap.] 1. n. That which fills a gap or hiatus, or, figuratively, that which serves as an expedient in an emergency.

I declare off; you shall not make a stop-gap of me.

Foot, The Cozeners, i. 1.
A good deal of conversation which is . . . introduced as a stop-gap. Proc. Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, XVII, 450.

II. a. Filling a gap or pause, as in the course of talk.

The "well's" and "ah's," "don't-you-know's," and other stop-gap interjections.

Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I, 312.

stop-gate (stop'gät), n. A gate used to divide a canal into sections, so that in case of a break in an embankment in one section the water can be shut off from flowing into it from other sections.

stop-hound (stop'hound), n. A dog trained to hunt slowly, stopping at the huntsman's signal. Davies (under stop).

Sir Roger, being at present too old for fox-hunting, to keep himself in action, has disposed of his beagles and got a pack of stop-hounds. Budget, Spectator, No. 116.

stopping (stöp'ping), n. [Verbal n. of *stopel*¹, v.] In mining, the act of excavating mineral ground to remove the ore after this has been rendered accessible by the necessary preliminary excavations—namely, sinking one or more shafts or winzes and running drifts.—Overhand stopping, a method of working out the contents of a vein by advancing from below upward, the miner being thus always helped by gravity. It is the method most commonly employed. That part of the material thrown down which is worth saving is raised to the surface, and the refuse rock (attle or deads) resting on the stulls remains in the excavation, helping to support the walls of the mine, and giving the miner a place on which to stand.—Underhand stopping, excavating the ore by working from above downward. In underhand stopping everything loosened by blasting has to be lifted up to be got out of the way. The advantage of this method is that in case the ore is very valuable, less of it need be lost by its getting so mixed with the attle that it cannot be picked out.

stop-knob (stop'nob), n. In organ-building, the handle by which the player controls the position of the slider belonging to a particular stop, or set of pipes. When the knob is drawn out, the pipes are ready to be sounded by the keys. The name of the stop is commonly written on the knob. Also called register and stop. See cut under reed-organ.

stopless (stop'les), a. [*< stop*¹ + -less.] Not to be stopped or checked. [Rare.]

Making a civil and staid senate rude
And stopless as a running multitude.
Sir W. Davenant, On King Charles the Second's Return.

stop-motion (stop'mo shün), n. In mech., a device for automatically arresting the motion of an engine or a machine, when from any cause it is necessary to stop suddenly to prevent injury to the machine or material. Stop-motion mechanisms are applied to looms, spinning, roving, and drawing-in lines, winding-machines, dividers, knitting-machines, and engines. They are divided into two classes. Those operated by some mechanical means, as a weighted arm resting on the thread of a loom, where the breakage of the thread causes the arm to fall; and those actuated by electricity, in which the fall of an arm closes a circuit, and by means of a magnet sets in motion some mechanical device for arresting the motion. In most machines the usual method is the shifting of the belt that moves the machine. In engines the stoppage and fall of the governor closes the steam-valve. Electrical stop-motion appliances, not self-acting, are sometimes used; in case of a break-down the use of a push-button releases a weight that by suitable mechanism shuts off steam from the engine.—Fork-and-grid stop-motion, in a power-loom, a stop-motion in which a grid on the batten acts in connection with a fork, which when the weft-thread breaks causes a lever to drop and stops the loom.

stop-net (stop'net), n. An addition to the main net in seine-fishing. Encyc. Brit., IX, 254.

stop-order (stop'ör'dér), n. In stock-broking, an order given by a person to his broker to sell or buy a specified stock when the price reaches a specified figure.

stop-over (stop'ö'ver), n. and a. See to stop off or over, under *stop*¹, v. i.

stoppage (stop'äj), n. [*< stop*¹ + -age.] 1. The act of stopping, in any sense, or the state of being stopped; especially, a stopping of motion or procedure.

His majesty, . . . finding unexpected stoppage, tells you he now looks for a present proceed in his affairs.
Court and Times of Charles I., I, 344.

2. A deduction made from pay or allowances to repay advances, etc.—Stoppage in transit or in transitu, in law, the act of a seller of goods who has sent them on their way to the buyer, in reclaiming them before they have come into the actual possession or control of the buyer, and terminating or suspending performance of the sale: a right allowed in case of discovering the buyer to be insolvent.

stoppet, n. [ME., < AS. stoppa, a vessel: see *stopel*².] A pail or bucket. Prompt. Parv., p. 477; Halliw.

stopped (stopt), p. a. 1. In playing musical instruments, noting the effect produced by stopping in any of the senses described under *stop*¹, v. t., 10.—2. In an organ, having the upper end plugged: said of a pipe: opposed to open. The tone produced by a stopped pipe is an octave lower than that produced by an open pipe of the same length.—Stopped diapason, in organ-building. See diapason (e).—Stopped note. See *note*¹.

stoppel¹, n. An obsolete form of stoppe.

stoppel², n. Same as estoppel.

Abatements, stoppels, inhibitions.

Marston, Scourge of Villanie, vii, 87.

stopper (stop'ér), n. [*< stop*¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who or that which stops or plugs. (a) One who fills up holes or openings.

The ancients of Gebal and the wise men thereof were in thee thy calkers [margin: stoppers of chinks].
Ezek. xxvii, 9.

(b) That which closes or fills up (an opening, etc.), as a plug, a bung, or a cork; especially, such an article for the mouth of a fruit-jar, decanter, or vial, when made of the same material as the vessel itself, and having no special name, as cork, bung, etc.; a stopple; specifically, a device for closing bottles for aerated water. See cut under siphon-bottle. (c) A convenient utensil made of wood, bone, ivory, or the like, formerly used to compress or pack some loose or flocculent substance into small compass.

I sold little bone "tobacco-stoppers"—they're seldom asked for now; stoppers is quite out of fashion.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I, 490.

(d) One who or that which brings to a stop or stand; specifically, one of the players in tennis, foot-ball, and other games, who stops the balls. Halliw. (e) Naut., a piece of rope secured at one end to a bolt or the like, used to check the motion of another rope or of a cable. Stoppers for cables are of various construction, such as an iron clamp with a lever or screw, a claw of iron with a rope attached, etc. (f) In an organ, a wooden plug inserted in the tops of certain kinds of pipes, as in those of the stopped diapason, flute, bourdon, etc., whence they are called stopped pipes. Such pipes are tuned by means of the stopper. (g) In a vehicle, a bar of wood with iron points pivoted to the body, and allowed to trail on the ground behind to serve as a stop or brake in ascending steep grades. Such a device is used, for instance, on ice-carts plying on hilly streets, where stoppages are frequent.

2. The upper pad or principal callosity of the sole of a dog's foot.

The leg, or bones below the knee [of the greyhound], should be of good size, the stopper (or upper pad) well united to it, and firm in texture.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 45.

3. A small tree of one of four species of the genus Eugenia occurring in Florida. Of the species E. buxifolia is the gurgoon or Spanish stopper, E. monticola is the white stopper, and E. procer is the red stopper. The last is somewhat abundant, and has a very heavy, hard, strong, and close-grained wood of a light yellowish-brown color, likely to be valuable for cabinet-making and coarse engraving. The remaining species so called is E. longipes, a rare tree bearing a small red fruit with the flavor of cranberries. All except the last are found also in the West Indies. Sargent.—Cat-head stopper. See cut-head.—Spanish stopper. See def. 3. (See also fighting-stopper.)

stopper (stop'ér), v. t. [< stopper, n.] 1. To close or secure with a stopple; as, stoppered bottles.—2. To fit with a stopple or stopples.

The mouth of the vessel to be stoppered is ground by an iron cone fixed to a lathe.

H. J. Powell, Glass-making, p. 73.

3. Naut., to secure with a stopper or stoppers.—To stopper a cable, to put stoppers on a cable to prevent it from running out of the ship when riding at anchor.

stopper-bolt (stop'er-bölt), n. Naut., a large ring-bolt driven into the deck before the main hatch, etc., for securing the stoppers.

stopper-hole (stop'er-höl), n. In iron-pudding, a hole in the door of the furnace through which the metal is stirred. See cut under puddling-furnace.

stopper-knot (stop'er-not), n. A knot in the end of a rope-stopper made by double-walling the strands.

stopping (stop'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *stop*¹, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which stops, in any sense. Specifically—(a) The process of filling cracks or fissures, as in an oil-painting, with a composition preparatory to restoring; also, the material used in the process.

The stopping, as this mixture [of size and whiting] is called, is pressed into the cracks by means of a palette-knife.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 127.

(b) In etching. See to stop out (a), under *stop*¹, v. t. (c) The act or process of altering the pitch of the tones of a musical instrument in any of the ways described under *stop*¹, v. t., 10.

2. Something that stops. Specifically—(a) In mining, any solid wall or brattice built across a passage in a mine, to shut out the air from the goaves, or to limit it to certain passages, or to keep the gas confined, or for any other purpose. (b) In dental surg., material for filling cavities in teeth. (c) In farriery, a ball or pad for stuffing the space in a horse's foot within the inner edge of the shoe.—Double stopping, in viol-playing, the act or process of producing tones simultaneously from two stopped strings.

stopping-brush (stop'ing-brush), n. 1. In hat-making, a brush used to sprinkle boiling water upon the napping and the hat-body to assist in uniting them.—2. In etching, a camel's-hair brush used in stopping out parts of etched plates.

stopping-coat (stop'ing-köt), n. The covering of resistant material applied to any part of an object about to be exposed to the action of an acid or other agent, in order to protect that part from such action.

stopping-knife (stop'ing-nif), n. A knife used in stopping, as a glaziers' putty-knife.

stop-plank (stop'plangk), n. One of the planks employed to form a sort of dam in some hydraulic works. They generally occupy vertical grooves in the wing walls of a lock or weir, to hold back water in case of temporary disorder of the lock-gates.

stop-plate (stop'plät), n. An end-bearing for the axle in a railroad journal-box, designed to resist end-play of the axle.

stopple¹ (stop'l), n. [< ME. stoppel, stoppell, stopell; < stop + -el, now -le, a noun-formative indicating the instrument (as also in whittle, swingle, etc.).] 1. That which stops or closes the mouth of a vessel; a stopper: as, a glass stopple; a cork stopple.

Item, j. litill botell, with j. cheyne and j. stopell, weiyng xxxviij. unces.
Paston Letters, I, 472.

Who knows, when he openeth the stopple, what may be in the bottle?
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii, 1.

2. A plug sometimes inserted in certain finger-holes of a flute or flageolet to accommodate its scale to some unusual series.

stopple¹ (stop'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. stoppled, pp. stopping. [*< stopple*¹, n.] To stop or close with a stopple.

His hours of study clos'd at last,
And finish'd his concise repast,
Stoppled his cruise, replac'd his book
Within its customary nook.

Cover, Moralizer Corrected.

stopple² (stop'l), n. [< ME. stopyll, stouple; a more orig. form of stubble: see stubble.] Stubble. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

And thoru haubert and ys coler, that nere nothyng souple,
He smot of ys heved as lygtyche as yt were a lute stopple.
Robert of Gloucester, p. 223.

stop-ridge (stop'rij), n. A band slightly elevated upon the surface of a blade or a similar part of an implement, intended to stop and hold it in the proper place, as in the handle. In stone celts the presence of such a stop-ridge marks a certain class or category.

stop-rod (stop'rod), n. In weaving, the rod which extends longitudinally under the batten of a loom, forming a part of the stop-motion, and which raises a catch that, if not raised, engages mechanism which immediately stops the loom. Every time the shuttle enters the shuttle-box fairly it acts upon a stop-finger to cause the stop-rod to lift the catch; but, if the shuttle is stopped in its course through the shed, the catch is not raised, the loom is stopped, and the warp, which would otherwise be broken by the impact of the reed against the shuttle while in the shed, is thus saved.

stop-ship (stop'ship), n. [< stop¹, v., + obj. ship; a translation of the Gr. ἵκκη, the remora; see Echeneis, and cf. mora, remora.] The fish remora.

O Stop-ship, . . . tell vs where thou doo'st thine Anchors hide;

Whence thou resistest Sayls, Owers, Wind, and Tide.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 5.

stop-thrust (stop'thrust), n. In fencing, a slight thrust at one's opponent, instead of a parry, made after he has begun to lunge forward in an attack. The stop-thrust goes over by delicate gradations into the time-thrust, but is not considered by fencers a fine blow like the time-thrust.

stop-valve (stop'valv), n. 1. In hydraul., a valve which closes a pipe against the passage of fluid. It is usually a disk which occupies a chamber above the pipe when the passageway through the latter is open, and is driven down by a screw to stop the aperture.

2. In steam-engines, a valve fitted to the steam-pipes, where they leave the several boilers, in such a way that any boiler may be shut off from the others and from the engines.

stop-watch (stop'woch), n. A watch which records small fractions of a second, and in which the hands can be stopped at any instant, so as to mark the exact time at which some event occurs: chiefly used in timing races.

He suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 12.

stop-water (stop'wā'tēr), n. [< stop¹, v., + obj. water.] 1. Naut., a drag.—2. A plug of soft wood driven tightly into a hole at the joint of a scarf, the expansion of which, when immersed, prevents water from working up through the scarf and behind the bottom plank-ing. In building iron ships a piece of canvas covered with red lead is used to make water-tight joints where caulking is difficult.

stop-wheel (stop'hvēl), n. See Geneva movement, under movement.

stop-work (stop'wērk), n. A device attached to the barrel of a watch, musical box, etc., to prevent overwinding.

stor¹, a. A Middle English form of stoor¹.

stor², n. [ME., < AS. stōr, incense, storax (= W. stor, resin, rosin), < L. storax, storax: see storax.] Incense.

storage (stōr'āj), n. [< store³ + -age.] 1. The act of storing, in any sense; specifically, the keeping of goods in a store, warehouse, or other place of deposit.—2. The price charged or paid for keeping goods in a storehouse.—Cold storage, storage in refrigerating chambers or other places artificially cooled, as for the preservation of articles liable to be damaged by heat.—Storage battery. See battery.—Storage magazine. Same as magazine, 1 (a).—Storage warehouse. See warehouse.

storage-bellows (stōr'āj-bel'ōz), n. See organd¹, 6.

storax (stō'raks), n. [= F. storax, styrax, < L. storax, styrax, < Gr. στειραξ, a sweet-smelling resin so called, also a tree producing it.] 1. A solid resin resembling benzoin, with the fragrance of vanilla, formerly obtained from a small tree, Styrax officinalis, of Asia Minor and Syria. It was in use from ancient times down to the close of the last century, but has disappeared from the market, the trees having been mostly reduced to bushes by excessive lopping.

This, that, and ev'ry thicket doth transpire

More sweet than storax from the hallowed fire.

Herrick, Apparition of his Mistress.

2. The tree yielding storax, or some other tree or shrub of the same genus. Among the American species, Styrax Californica is a handsome Californian shrub. See cut in next column.—Liquid storax, a balsam known from ancient times with the true storax, obtained by boiling and pressing from the inner bark of the Oriental sweet-gum tree, Liquidambar orientalis, itself also called liquidambar. It is a semi-fluid adhesive substance with the properties of a stimulant expectorant, but now scarcely used in Western practice except as a constituent in the compound tincture of benzoin (resembling friars' balsam: see benzoin), and as an application for itch. It has long been used in making incense and fumigating preparations, and also enters into perfumery. Its chief markets are China and India. A similar balsam is obtained, chiefly in Burma, from Altingia excelsa, known (together with the last) in East Indian commerce as rose-maloe, rasamala, etc. In Formosa and southern China a dry terebinthinous resin of the same character is derived from Liquidambar Formosana (a species recently identified). An American liquidambar, or liquid storax, or a substitute for it, is procured as natural exudation or by incision from the bark of the sweet-gum, Liquidambar styraciflua, in the hotter parts of its habitat. It is better known in Europe than in the United States, where it is perhaps most used for making chewing-gum.

Branch with flowers of Styrax Californica, a leaf, showing venation.

Storax liquida [cometh] from Rhodes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 277.

Storax ointment. See ointment.

storax-tree (stō'raks-trē), n. Same as storax, 2.

Such goods are obtainable only on a general order. — General store, a store or shop where goods of all ordinary kinds are kept for sale; especially, such a store in a country village or at cross-roads. — In store, laid up; on hand; ready to be produced: as, we know not what the future has in store for us.

I have an hour's talk in store for you.

Shak., J. C., ii. 2. 121.

Marine, ordnance, public stores. See the qualifying words. — Sea-stores, provisions and supplies on shipboard for use at sea. Compare ship-stores. — Ship-stores, provisions and supplies for use on board ships at sea or in port: such supplies are sealed, as non-dutiable, by the customs officers. — Small stores, in a man-of-war, a general term embracing tinware, tobacco, soap, razors, brushes, thread, needles, etc., issued and charged to the men by the paymaster. — Subsistence stores. See subsistence. — To set store by. See set¹, n. t., 18. — To tell no store off, to make no account of; set no store by.

I ne telle of laxatytes no store,

For they be venymous, I woot it weel;

I hem diffye, I love hem never a deel.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 334.

II. a. 1†. Hoarded; laid up: as, store linen; store fruit.

Of this treasure . . . the gold was accumulate, and store treasure; . . . but the silver is still growing.

Bacon, Holy War.

2. Containing stores; set apart for receiving stores or supplies. Compare store-city. — 3. Obtained at a store or shop; purchased or purchasable at a shop or store: as, store clothes; store teeth (humorously used for false teeth). This word in rural or frontier use is commonly opposed to home-made, and implies preference: as, stylish store curtains; in town use it is usually opposed to made to order, and implies disparagement: as, clumsy store boots. [Colloq. U. S.] — Store casemate. Same as barrack casemate (which see, under barrack). — Store cattle, lean cattle bought for fattening by squatters who find that they have more grass than the natural increase of their herd requires. [Australia.]

Oh, we are not fit for anything but store cattle: we are all blady grass. Mrs. Campbell Praed, Head Station, p. 74.

Store pay, payment for country produce, labor, etc., by goods from a store, in lieu of cash; barter. [Rural, U. S.]

For Chaucer's direct source, it might be well worth while for students of comparative storiology who have leisure . . . to examine these and similar monkish collections of exempla [of the thirteenth century].

N. and Q., 7th ser., I. 485.

stork (stōrk), n. [ME. stork, < AS. storc = D. MLG. LG. stork = OHG. storah, MHG. G. storch (also OHG. store, MHG. G. dial. stork) = Icel. storkr = Sw. Dan. stork, a stork; cf. OBulg. strūkū, Bulg. strūk, Slovak. struk = Serv. stork = ORuss. storkū, Russ. storkhū = Lith. storkus = Letg. storks = Hung. eszterg = Albanian storkjok, a stork. The relation of the Teut. to the Slav. and other forms is undetermined. Cf. Gr. τόρυς, a vulture, τόρυς ὑπόβοις, a swan.] A large alutic grallatorial bird, of the family Ciconiidae and especially of the subfamily Ciconiinae (which see for technical characters). The stork is related to the herons, spoonbills, and ibises, but not very closely to the cranes. There are several species, found in nearly all temperate and tropical regions. They are tall and stately birds, equaling the cranes and larger herons in stature, but are readily distinguished by many technical characters. Storks are wading birds, frequenting the vicinity of water; but some of them become semi-domesticated, and often nest on buildings. Their fidelity and amiability are traditional. They feed chiefly on reptiles (as snakes and lizards), amphibians (as frogs), fishes, mollusks, and worms, but also sometimes capture small quadrupeds and birds. The best-known species is the common white stork of Europe, Ciconia alba; when adult, it is pure-white with black-tipped wings and reddish bill and feet; it is about 3½ feet long, and stands 4 feet high. The black stork of the same country is C. nigra, a rarer species. Various birds of different countries, technically storks, are known by other names, as adjutant, marabout, maguari, jabiru, shell-bill, and wood ibis. See these words, and cuts under adjutant-bird, Ciconiidae, Grallæ, jabiru, openbill, Pelagomorphæ, simbil, and Tantalus.—Black-necked stork, Xenorhynchus australis, of India and Australia, related to the American jabiru and African saddle-billed stork, the three being often placed in the genus Mycteria.—Black stork. See def.—Episcopal stork, Dissoura episcopus. See cut under Pelagomorphæ.—Giant stork, the adjutant-bird.—Hair-crested stork, Leptoptilus (Cranopelargus) javaniensis, a small and quite distinct species of marabout, related to the adjutant, found in parts of India, Java, Sumatra, etc.—Maguari stork, Euzenura maguari. See maguari.—Marabout stork. See marabout, and cut under adjutant-bird.—Pouched stork. Same as adjutant-bird.—Saddle-billed stork, Ephippiorhynchus senegalensis. See the generic name.—White-bellied stork, Sphenorhynchus abdimi. See cut under simbil.—White stork. See def.

stork-billed (stōrk'bīld), a. Having a bill like a stork's, as a kingfisher of the genus Pelargopsis. See cut under Pelargopsis.

stork's-bill (stōrk's'bīl), n. 1. A plant of the genus Erodium, particularly the heron's-bill, E. cicutarium (also called hemlock stork's-bill), a low bushy herb with pinnate leaves, a mostly Old World plant, abundantly naturalized in many parts of the United States, perhaps indigenous in the west. See al-fihilla.—2. A plant of the related genus Pelargonium, which includes the geraniums, etc., of gardens.

Flowering Plant of Stork's-bill (Erodium cicutarium). a. one of the carpels.

storm (stōrm), n. [ME. storm, < AS. storm, storm = OS. MD. D. MLG. LG. storm = OHG. MHG. G. Sturm = Icel. stormr = Sw. Dan. storm (not in Goth.; cf. It. stormo, a fight, It. dial. Sturm = Pr. estorn = OF. estour, estor, estur (> *E. stour*3, a tumult, stir) = Ir. Gael. stóirm = Bret. stourm, a storm, all < Teut.]; perhaps, with formative -m, from the root of *stir*¹ (√ stir, √ stor) or of L. sternere, strew: see *stir*¹, strew.] 1. A disturbance of the normal condition of the atmosphere, manifesting itself by winds of unusual direction or force, or by rain (often with lightning and thunder), snow, or hail, or by several of these phenomena in combination; a tempest: also used with reference to precipitation only, as in hail-storm, thunder-storm, snow-storm. A storm is usually associated with an area of low pressure, and its intensity or violence depends upon the steepness of the density-gradients which produce it. The terms area of low pressure, cyclone, cyclonic storm, and storm are often used interchangeably. In area of low pressure the primary reference is to the state of the barometer, in cyclone it is to the gyratory character of the atmospheric circulation, and in storm to the disturbance of the weather: but each term is extended to include the whole of the attendant phenomena.

And there arose a great storm of wind. Mark iv. 37.
Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm.
Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 29.
2. Specifically—(a) Technically, in nautical use, a wind of force 11 on the Beaufort scale, being that in which a man-of-war could carry only storm-staysails.
The wind suddenly shifted in a heavy rain squall from SSE. to W., and increased to a storm; at 12 noon the barometer read lowest, and the wind was blowing a storm.
Monthly Weather Review (1887), p. 40.

(b) A fall of snow. (c) A prolonged frost. [Prov. Eng.] Hence, figuratively—3. A tempestuous flight or descent of objects fiercely hurled: as, a storm of missiles.

No drizzling shower,
But rattling storm of arrows barb'd with fire.

Milton, P. L., vi. 546.

4. A violent disturbance or agitation of human society; a civil, political, or domestic commotion; a tumult; a clamor.

I will stir up in England some black storm
Shall blow ten thousand souls to heaven or hell.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 349.

5. A destructive or overwhelming calamity; extremity of adversity or disaster.
Having passed many bitter brunts and blasts of vengeance, they dread no storms of Fortune.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., February, Embleme.

An old man, broken with the storms of state.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 21.

6. A vehement or passionate outbreak, as of some emotion, or of the expression of such emotion: as, a storm of indignation; a storm of applause; a storm of hisses.

Mark'd you not how her sister
Began to scold and raise up such a storm?

Shak., T. of the S., i. 1. 177.

Her bosom shaken with a sudden storm of sighs.
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

7. Milit., a violent assault on a fortified place or strong position; a dashing attempt by troops to capture a fortified place, as by scaling the walls or forcing the gates.

How by storm the walls were won,
Or how the victor sacked and burnt the town.

Dryden.

Cyclonic storm, one that accompanies or is caused by a cyclone.—Electric storm. See electric.—Eye of a storm, the calm region at the center of a violent cyclonic storm, where the clouds clear away and blue sky appears—occurring mostly in the tropics, but also experienced more or less perfectly in higher latitudes. This phenomenon is due to the circumstance that the winds immediately bordering the central area blow circularly around it, leaving a region of calm. The centrifugal force of the wind intensifies the diminution of pressure, and develops a tendency toward a gently descending current from above, and a consequent clearing of the sky.—High-area storm, a storm associated with an area of high pressure.—Low-area storm. Same as cyclonic storm.—Magnetic, revolving, etc., storm. See the adjectives.—Storm and stress (a translation of the German Sturm und Drang, alluding to a drama by Klinger, "Sturm und Drang"), a name given to a period in German literary history (about 1770 to 1790) influenced by a group of younger writers whose works were characterized by passion and reaction from the old methods; hence, a proverbial phrase for unrest or agitation.—To take by storm. (a) Milit., to carry by assault. See def. 7.

The recollection of the victory of Roanoke imparted to the Federals that assurance which is a great element of success; they knew that a battery could be taken by storm.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 587.

(b) To captivate or carry away by surprising or delighting: as, the new singer has taken the town by storm.—Wind-storm, a storm with heavy wind, without precipitation.—Syn. 1. Tempest, etc. See *wind*².

storm (stôrm), v. [< ME. stormen, sturmen, < AS. styrman = D. MLG. LG. stormen = OHG. sturman, MHG. G. stürmen = levcl. styrma = Sw. storma = Dan. storme, storm; cf. It. stormire, make a noise, stormeggiare, ring the storm-bell, throng together; from the noun.] 1. intrans. 1. To blow with great force; also, to rain, hail, snow, or sleet, especially with violence: used impersonally: as, it storms.— 2. To fume; scold; rage; be in a violent agitation or passion; raise a tempest.

The Dolphin then, derysing Land (at last),
Stormes with himselfe for hauing made such haste.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 5.

When . . . I see a gentleman lose his money with serenity, I recognise in him all the great qualities of a philosopher. If he storms and invokes the gods, I lament that he is not placed at the head of a regiment.

Steele, Guardian, No. 174.

3. To move with violence; rush angrily or impetuously: as, he stormed about the room.

Bobby Wick stormed through the tents of his Company.
R. Kipling, Only a Subaltern.

II. trans. To attack and attempt to take possession of, as by scaling walls or forcing gates or breaches; assault: as, to storm a fortified town: often used figuratively.

With eager warmth they fight, ambitious all
Who first shall storm the breach, or mount the wall.
Addison, To the King.

storm-area (stôrm'ā-rē-ā), n. The area covered by a storm; the region within the closed isobars surrounding a center of low pressure. In the United States this region is generally an oval whose length is, on the average, nearly twice its width. Its longest diameter may be turned in any azimuth, but is most frequently directed to a point between north and north 60° east. Over the ocean storm-areas are generally nearly circular.

storm-beat, storm-beaten (stôrm'bēt, -bē'tn), a. Beaten or damaged by storms.

storm-belt (stôrm'belt), n. A belt of maximum storm-frequency. On charts containing a large number of storm-tracks the paths are found to be mostly divided into several well-defined groups whose loci form natural storm-belts. In the United States three storm-belts are distinguished: (1) that of storms which appear in the northwest British provinces, advance eastward to the lake region, and thence down the St. Lawrence valley; (2) that of storms which originate in the southwest near the Gulf of Mexico, and move northeastward to the lakes; (3) that of the West India hurricanes, which first move westerly, and then northeastward along the Atlantic coast. Over Europe three storm-belts may be distinguished: one lying across the northern Mediterranean, one across the North Sea and the Baltic, and one northeast and southwest off the coast of Norway and the British Isles. Also called storm-zone.

storm-bird (stôrm'bērd), n. 1. A petrel; one of the birds of the family Procellariidae, including the albatrosses, fulmars, etc., as well as those to which the name petrel is more commonly applied; specifically, the stormy petrel. See cut under petrel.—2. A bird that indicates or seems to foretell bad weather by its cries or other actions, as a storm-cock. Compare rain-bird.

storm-bound (stôrm'bound), a. Confined or delayed by storms; relating to hindrance by storms: as, we were storm-bound in port.

Weeks of storm-bound inactivity.

Carlyle, To John Carlyle, Feb. 11, 1830.

storm-card (stôrm'kârd), n. A transparent card containing lines to represent the wind-directions in all quarters of a cyclonic storm: devised by Reid as an aid to seamen in avoiding dangerous storms. When the card is drawn to suitable scale, and placed over the position of a vessel on a chart, so that the observed wind-direction and the same wind-direction on the card are brought into coincidence, the bearing of the center of the card from the point of observation indicates the direction of the center of the storm. Knowing the direction of the storm-center, its probable path can be laid down with considerable precision, and the best course for the vessel may then be determined. It is now known that a storm-card cannot universally be used to discover the bearing of a storm-center, for the angle between the wind and the radius varies in different latitudes, and is different at different distances from the center. Also called storm-circle, storm-compass.

storm-center (stôrm'sen'tēr), n. The position of lowest pressure in a cyclonic storm. In the typical case the wind throughout the storm-area blows spirally inward toward the storm-center, changing from a radial to an approximately circular path, and increasing in force as the center is approached. The center itself is an area of comparative calm, accompanied by a partial or complete clearing away of the clouds, and a mild temperature. (See eye of a storm, under storm.) Violent ocean storms frequently exemplify this typical description; but in land storms, which present irregularities of all kinds, these conditions are in general only partially realized.

storm-circle (stôrm'sēr'kl), n. Same as storm-card.

storm-cloud (stôrm'kloud), n. A cloud that brings or threatens storm.

storm-cock (stôrm'kok), n. 1. The fieldfare, Turdus pilaris; also, the mistlethrush, T. viscivorus.

Its song . . . it [the missel] begins . . . very early in the spring, often with the new year, in blowing showery weather, which makes the inhabitants of Hampshire call it the storm-cock. Pennant, Brit. Zool. (ed. 1776), l. 302.

2. The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. [Prov. Eng. in all uses.]

storm-compass (stôrm'kum'pas), n. Same as storm-card.

storm-cone (stôrm'kōn), n. A cone consisting of tarred canvas extended on a frame 3 feet high and 3 feet wide at the base, used either alone or along with the drum as a storm-signal. See cut under storm-signal. [Eng.]

storm-current (stôrm'kur'ēnt), n. A surface sea-current produced by the force of the wind in a storm. Such a current frequently outruns its generating storm, and affords the first announcement thereof on a distant shore by increasing there the intensity of the usual current or by changing its set.

storm-door (stôrm'dōr), n. An outer or additional door for protection against inclement weather: in general used temporarily, for the winter only.

storm-drum (stôrm'drum), n. A cylinder of tarred canvas extended on a hoop 3 feet high and 3 feet wide, hoisted in conjunction with the cone as a storm-signal. See storm-signal. [Eng.]

stormer (stôr'mēr), n. [< storm + -er.] One who storms; specifically (milit.), a member of an assaulting party.

storm-finch (stôrm'finch), n. See *finch*¹, and cut under petrel.

storm-flag (stôrm'flag), n. See storm-signal.

stormful (stôrm'fūl), a. [< storm + -ful.] Abounding with storms.

They know what spirit brews the stormful day.
Collins, Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands.

stormfulness (stôrm'fūl-nes), n. The state of being stormful; stormy character or condition.

storm-glass (stôrm'glâs), n. A hermetically sealed tube containing an alcoholic solution of camphor, together with crystals of nitrate of potash and ammonium chloride: so named because an increase in the amount of the precipitate was supposed to indicate the approach of stormy weather. The changes in the amount of the precipitate are due solely to variations of temperature, and the instrument is simply a chemical thermometer.

storm-house (stôrm'hous), n. A temporary shelter for men employed in constructing or guarding railroads, or other works in exposed situations.

stormily (stôr'mi-li), adv. In a stormy manner; tempestuously.

storminess (stôr'mi-nes), n. The state of being stormy, or of being agitated or visited by violent winds; tempestuousness; impetuosity; violence.

storming-party (stôr'ming-pār'ti), n. Milit., the party to whom is assigned the duty of making the first assault in storming an enemy's works.

storm-kite (stôrm'kit), n. A device, on the principle of a kite, for carrying a rope from a ship to the shore in a storm.

stormless (stôrm'les), a. [< storm + -less.] Free from storms; without storm.

Our waking thoughts Suffer a stormless shipwreck in the pools
Of sullen slumber. Tennyson, Harold, v. 1.

storm-pane (stôrm'pân), n. An extra square of glass fitted in a frame provided with clamps, used to fit over a window in an exposed building, as a lighthouse, in case of breakage.

storm-path (stôrm'pâth), n. Same as storm-track.

storm-pavement (stôrm'pāv'ment), n. In hydraul. engin., a sloping stone pavement lining the sea-face of a pier or breakwater. E. H. Knight.

storm-petrel (stôrm'pet'rel), n. A small blackish petrel, belonging to the genus Procellaria as now restricted, or to one of a few closely related genera, as Oceanites, Cymochorea, and Halocybena. The three best-known storm-petrels are Procellaria pelagica, Cymochorea leucorhoa, and Oceanites oceanicus. All are also called Mother Carey's chickens. See cut under petrel. The form stormy petrel is also common.

storm-proof (stôrm'prōf), a. Proof against storms or stress of weather.

storm-sail (stôrm'sāl), n. A sail made of very stout canvas, of smaller size than the corresponding sail in ordinary use, set in squally or heavy weather.

storm-signal (stôrm'sig'nal), n. A signal displayed on sea-coasts and lake-shores for indicating the expected prevalence of high winds or storms. For this purpose flags and lanterns are used in the United States, and a cone and drum in Great Britain. In the practice of the United States Weather Bureau, a red flag with black center is displayed by day when a violent storm is expected, and an additional pennant indicates the quadrant of the probable wind-direction, as follows: red pennant above flag, northeasterly winds; red pennant below flag, southeasterly winds; white pennant above flag, norwesterly winds; white pennant below flag, southwesterly winds. By night, a red light indicates easterly winds, and a white light above a red light indicates westerly winds. In the British system the inverted cone indicates a south gale, the upright cone a north gale, while the addition of the drum indicates that the winds are expected to be of marked violence. See weather-signal.

English storm signal, indicating dangerous winds from the south.

storm-stay (stôrm'stā), n. A stay on which a storm-sail is set.

storm-stayed (stôrm'stād), a. Prevented from proceeding on, or interrupted in the course of, a journey or voyage by storms or stress of weather.

storm-stone (stôrm'stōn), n. Same as thunder-bolt.

storm-tossed (stôrm'tost), a. Tossed about by storm or tempest: as, a storm-tossed bark; hence, agitated by conflicting passions or emotions: as, his storm-tossed spirit is at rest.

storm-track (stôrm'trak), n. The path traversed by the center of a cyclonic storm. North of the parallel of 30° storm-tracks almost invariably pursue an easterly course, having generally a northerly inclination. Within the tropics storm-tracks almost invariably tend westerly, generally with an inclination toward the pole; they have rarely, if ever, been traced nearer to the equator than 6°. Continuous storm-tracks are sometimes traced across North America, the Atlantic ocean, and Europe; but in general less than 12 per cent. of the storms leaving America reach the European coast.

storm-wind (stôrm'wind), n. The wind or blast of a storm or tempest; a hurricane; also, a wind that brings a storm.

Then comes, with an awful roar,
Gathering and sounding on,
The storm-wind from Labrador,
The wind Euroclydon,
The storm-wind!

Longfellow, Midnight Mass.

storm-window (stôrm'win'dō), n. 1. An outer window to protect the inner from inclemency of the weather.—2. A window raised from the roof and slated above and on each side.

stormy (stôr'mi), a. [< ME. stormig, < AS. stormig (= D. Sw. stormig = MHG. stürmic, G. stürmig), < storm, storm = storm.] 1. Characterized by storm or tempest, or by high winds; tempestuous; boisterous: as, a stormy season.

No cloudy show of stormy blustering weather
Doth yet in his fair welkin once appear.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 115.

His trumpet has often been heard by the neighbors, of a stormy night, mingling with the howling of the blast.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 448.

2. Characterized by violent disturbances or contentions; agitated; turbulent.

For love is yet the most stormy lyf,
Right of hymself, that ever was begonne.

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 778.

His [Warren Hastings's] administration, so eventful and stormy, closed in almost perfect quiet.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

3. Violent; passionate; easily roused to anger or strife.

The lives of all your loving complices
Lean on your health; the which, if you give o'er
To stormy passion, must perform decay.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. l. 165.

The stormy chiefs of a desert but extensive domain.

Scott.

4. Associated with storms, as seen in them or supposed to presage them: specifically, in ornithology, noting certain petrels.—Stormy petrel. Same as storm-petrel.—Syn. 1. Windy, gusty, squally, blustering. See *wind*².

storm-zone (stôrm'zōn), n. Same as storm-belt.

The regions between 40° and 70° latitude are the great storm zones of the world.

R. Hinman, Eclectic Physical Geography, p. 94.

stornello (stôr-nel'lo), n.; pl. stornelli (-li). [It.] A form of Italian folk-song, usually improvised and either sentimental or satirical.

¹⁰ See, e.g., letters (tr. by Hollowes, 1677), p. 341.

O. W. Holmes, Atlantic Monthly, LXXX, 1897, 303.

stound² (stound), v. i. [Also stoun; = Icel. stynja = Dan. stønne = D. stenen = LG. stenen, stönen, > G. stöhnen, groan. Cf. *stound*², n.] 1. To ache; smart. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To long;

pine: as, the cows stound for grass. Halliwel.
[Prov. Eng.]

stound², n. [ME.: see stound², v.] Sorrow; grief; longing.

To putte away the stoundes stronge,
Which in me lasten alle to longe.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 2639.

stound³ (stound), v. t. [A var. of stun¹, as astound of astun, astoun: see stun¹, stoun², astoun, astun, etc.] 1. To stun as with strokes; beat heavily: as, to stound the ears with the strokes of a bell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To astound; amaze.

Your wrath, weak boy? Tremble at mine unless Retraction follow close upon the heels
Of that late stounding insult.

Keats, Otho the Great, iv. 2. 95.

stound³ (stound), n. [< stound³, v.] 1. A stunning blow or stroke; the force of a blow.

Like to a mazed steare,
That yet of mortal stroke the stound doth beare.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. vi. 37.

2. Astonishment; amazement; bewilderment.

Thus we stood as in a stound,
And wet with tears, like dew, the ground.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Prol., l. 23.

stound⁴ (stound). An obsolete past participle of stun¹. Spenser.

stound⁵ (stound), n. [A dial. var. of stond, stand: see stand, n.] A vessel to contain small beer. [Prov. Eng.]

stoundmeale (stound'möl), adv. [< ME. stoundmeale, stoundmeale, < AS. stundmælan, at times, < stund, time, space of time (see stund¹), + mælan, dat. pl. of mæl, a time: see meal², and cf. dropmeal, flockmeal, piecemeal, thousandmeal, etc.] At times; at intervals; from moment to moment: also used adjectively.

The lyf of love is fulle contrarie,
Which stoundmeale can ofte varie.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 2304.

This wynde that moore and moore
Thus stoundmeale encreseth in my face.
Chaucer, Troilus, v. 674.

stoup. See stoup¹, stoup², stoup⁴.

stour¹, n. See stour¹.

stour², v. and n. See stour².

stour³ (stour or stör), n. [Early mod. E. also stoure, Sc. also sture; < ME. stour, store, stor, stur, < OF. estor, estour (also rarely estorme, also estormie, estourmie, esturmie), a tumult, conflict, assault, shock, battle, = Pr. estor = It. stormo, dial. sturm, tumult, noise, bustle, throng, troop, band, < OHG. sturm, storm, battle, = E. storm: see storm. For the loss of the final n in OF. estor, turn, jour, day, etc., with loss of final n (see turn, tour²).] 1. Tumult; conflict; a warlike encounter; shock of arms; battle.

Men sen al day and reden ek in stouryes
That after sharpe stoures ben of victories.

Gavin Douglas, Æneid, xii. Prol., l. 212.

stouth-and-routh (stouth'and-routh'), n. [A Sc. riming formula, in which one of the words appears to be wrenched, as usual, from its lit.
meaning: prob. orig. as if 'plunder and plenty',
i. e. much property acquired and inherited:
stouth, theft, stealth (cf. stouthrief, robbery)
with violence, also provision, furniture];

routh, plenty: see routh³.] Plenty; abundance.
[Scotch.]

It's easy for your honour and the like o' you gentle folks to say sae, that hae stouth-and-routh, and fire and feeding, and meat and claiith, and sit dry and canny by the fireside. Scott, Antiquary, vi.

Lett. istaba = Finn. tupa = Hung. szoba, a bathroom; all prob. < OHG. or G. The orig. sense appears to have been 'a heated room.' The application of the name to a means of heating is comparatively recent. From the Teut., through OF., are derived E. stovel and stive², which are thus doublets of stovel.] 1. A room, chamber, or house artificially warmed.
[Obsolete except in the specific uses (a), (b), below.]

When a certain Frenchman came to visit Melanchthon he found him in his stove, with one hand dandling his child in the swaddling clouts and the other holding a book and reading it. Fuller.

When you have taken Care of your Horse, you come whole into the Stove, Boots, Baggage, Dirt and all, for that is a common Room for all Corners.

N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 288.

Specifically—(a) In hort., a glazed and artificially heated building for the culture of tender plants: the same as a greenhouse or hothouse, except that the stove maintains a higher temperature—not lower than 60° F. See greenhouse, hothouse, and dry-stove. [Eng.] (b) A drying-chamber, as for plants, extracts, conserves, etc.; also, a highly heated drying-room, used in various manufactures.

They are sumtimes inforced to rype and dry them [grain]

R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 292].

2. A place for taking either liquid or vapor baths; a bath-house or bath-room.

In that village there was a Stove, into which the captaine went in the morning, requesting M. Garrard to go also to the same to wash himself.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 423.

There are in Fez a hundred bath-stoves well built, with four Halls in each, and certain Galleries without, in which they put off their clothes.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 617.

3. A closed or partly closed vessel or receiver in which fuel is burned, the radiated heat being utilized for warming a room or for cooking.
Stoves are made of cast-iron and sheet-iron, and also of earthenware in the form of tiles cemented together, or plaster held together by a frame of wire, or the like, and of masonry solidly put together. The stoves of tiles, masonry, etc., radiate less heat than iron stoves, but when heated remain hot for a long time. Stoves are divided into the two main classes of cooking-stoves and warming-stoves, and are also classified according to the fuel used, as wood-stoves, gas-stoves, etc. There are many varieties, named according to their use, as the car-stove, camp-stove, foot-stove, timmer's stove, etc., or according to some attachment, as a water-back stove. Warming-stoves range from diverge, or at least cross beyond the fixation-point. Diplopia from this cause is said to be crossed.—Latent strabismus, strabismus existing only when one eye is occluded.—Manifest strabismus, strabismus occurring when both eyes are open.—Monolateral strabismus, strabismus in which it is always the visual axis of the same eye which fails to pass through the fixation-point.—Relative strabismus, strabismus occurring for some and not for other distances of the fixation-point.—Strabismus deorsum vergens, downward squint, in which the visual axis of the squinting eye passes lower than the fixation-point.—Strabismus sursum vergens, upward squint, in which the visual axis of the squinting eye passes higher than the fixation-point.

strabometer (strā-bom'ē-tēr), n. [Gr. στράβος, crooked, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring strabismus; a strabismometer.

strabotomy (strā-bot'ō-mi), n. [Gr. στράβος, crooked, distorted (< στρίβω, twist, turn about), + -τομή, < τέμνω, τμήνω, cut.] In surg., the operation for the cure of squint, by cutting the attachment of a muscle or muscles to the eyeball.

strachyt, n. A word of doubtful form and meaning, occurring only in the following passage, where in the earlier editions it is italicized as a title or proper name.

There is example for't; the lady of the Strachy married the yeoman of the wardrobe. Shak., T. N., ii. 5. 45.

strackent. An obsolete past participle of strike. Chaucer.

strakt (strakt), a. [Aphetic form of distract.] Distracted. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 100.

3. To escape or stretch out ramblingly or beyond proper limits; spread widely apart; shoot too far in growth.

Trim off the small superfluous branches on each side of the hedge, that straggle too far out.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

How these tall
Naked geraniums straggle!
Browning, Pippa Passes, i.

4. To be dispersed; be apart from any main body; stand alone; be isolated; occur at intervals or apart from one another; occur here and there: as, the houses straggle all over the district.

straggler (strag'lér), n. [Gr. straggle + -er¹.]

1. One who straggles or strays away, as from his fellows or from the direct or proper course; one who lags behind or becomes separated in any way from his companions, as from a body of troops on the march.

This manner of speech is termed the figure of digression by the Latines, following the Greeke originall; we also call him the straggler, by allusion to the souldier that marches out of his array. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 195.

The first stragglers of a battalion of rocks, guarding a sort of pass, beyond which the beck rushed down a waterfall. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxxiv.

2. Specifically, in ornith., a stray, or strayed bird, out of its usual range, or off its regular migration. The stragglers are the casual or accidental visitants in any avifauna. In the nature of the case they are never numerous as regards individuals; but the list of what are technically called stragglers in any region or locality usually becomes, in the course of time, a long one, so far as species are concerned. Thus, in the avifauna of the District of Columbia, the stragglers are about as many species as the regular visitants of either summer or winter, or the permanent residents of the year round, though fewer than the spring and autumn migrants.

3. One who roams or wanders about at random, or without settled direction or object; a wanderer; a vagabond; especially, a wandering, shiftless fellow; a tramp.

Let's whip these stragglers o'er the seas again.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 327.

Bottles missing are supposed to be half stolen by stragglers and other servants.

Swift, Advice to Servants (Butler).

4. Something that shoots beyond the rest or too far; an exuberant growth.

Let thy hand supply the pruning-knife,

And crop luxuriant stragglers.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, ii. 503.

5. Something that stands apart from others; a solitary or isolated individual.

In a manner alone of that tyme left a standing straggler, peradventur, though my frute be very small, yet, because the ground from whence it sprong was so good, I may yet be thought somewhat fitt for seede, whan all yow the rest ar taken up for better stre Ascham, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 14.

straggle-tooth (strag'l-töth), n. An irregular or misshapen tooth; a snaggle-tooth; a snag.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, I. 537.

2. Without bend or deviation, like a string tightly stretched; not crooked or curved; right; in geom., lying, as a line, evenly between its points. This is Euclid's definition. The principal characteristic of a straight line is that it is completely determined, if unlimited, by any two points taken upon it, or, if limited, by its two extremities. The idea of measurement does not enter into the idea of a straight line, and it is unnecessary to introduce that idea into the definition, as is done when it is said (after Legendre) to be the shortest distance between two points.

He that knoweth what is straight doth even thereby discern what is crooked, because the absence of straightness in bodies capable thereof is crookedness.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. 8.

There is no moe such Cesars; other of them may have crook'd noses, but to owe such straight arms, none.

Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 1. 38.

Be pleased to let thy Holy Spirit lead me in the straight paths of sanctity, without defections to either hand.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 86.

3. Without interruption or break; direct.

Forth-with declarid to hys peple all,
And to thys cite his peple gan call,
Wher-vnto thai had an eyn streight way.

Rom. of Parley (E. E. T. S.), I. 1308.

With straight air—that is, with the pressure from the main reservoir, or the air-pump, going directly to the brake cylinder—the engineer can apply the brakes to all the wheels of his train simultaneously.

Scribner's Mag., VI. 333.

4. Direct; authoritative; sure; reliable: as, a straight tip. [Slang.]—5. Upright; marked by adherence to truth and fairness; fair; honorable: as, a man straight in all his dealings. [Colloq.]—6. Proceeding or acting with directness; keeping true to the course. [Colloq.]

He shows himself to be a man of wide reading, a pretty straight thinker, and a lively and independent critic.

The Nation, Dec. 6, 1888, p. 439.

Finally, being belted, curled, and set straight, he descended upon the drawing-room.

Thackeray, Pendennis, vii.

He told her that she needn't mind the place being not quite straight, he had only come up for a few hours—he should be busy in the studio.

H. James, Jr., The Century, XXXVI. 218.

8. Unqualified; unreserved; out-and-out: as, a straight Democrat (that is, one who supports the entire platform and policy of his party).—9. Unmixed; undiluted; neat. [Slang.]

Dissipating their rare and precious cash on "whisky straight" in the ever-recurring bar-rooms.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 76.

10. Last end west; along an east and west line; position of the body in Christian burial.

11. In a burial, a burial in Christian burial that is straight, as in a straight line, and therefore make her straight, the crown hath set on her and finds it Christian burial. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 4.

12. In a line, consisting of a sequence; forming a straight line; as, a straight hand; a straight flush. A straight face, an unsuited face; a sober, unadorned expression, as he could with difficulty keep a straight face. Long straight. Long straight. Straight accents, the long marks over the vowels, as a, e, i, o, u, y.—Straight angle. See angle, 1.—Straight arch, in arch, a form of arch spanning an aperture in which the intrados is represented by straight lines which meet in a point at the top and comprise two sides of a triangle.—Straight ends and walls, a system of working out, somewhat similar to "board and pillar." (N. W. Wales).—Straight flush. See flush.—Straight intestine, bowel, or gut, the rectum. See cuts under abdominal, intestine, and rectum.—Straight sheer. See sheer, 1.—Straight sinus, ticket, tubule, etc. See the nouns.

strain¹ (strān), v. [*Early mod. E. also strayne; < ME. straynen, streinen, streynen, straynen, < OF. streindre, estraindre, straindre, F. estreindre = Pr. estrenher, estreigner = It. strignere, stregnere, stringere, < L. stringere, pp. strictus, draw tight; akin to Gr. σπῆλαι, twisted, σπῆλαιον, press out, Lith. stregti, become stiff, freeze, AS. streccan, stretch, etc.: see stretch, straight¹. From L. stringere are also ult. E. constrain, restrain, stringent, strait¹, strict, etc.] I. trans. 1†. To draw out; stretch; extend, especially with effort or care.*

And if thi vynes footes IV ascende,

Thenne armes IV is goode forth forto streyne.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 70.

All their actions, voyces, and gestures, both in charging and retiring, were so strained to the height of their qualitie and nature that the strangeness thereof made it seeme very delightful.

Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 136.

2†. To draw tight; tighten; make taut.

To the pyller, lorde, also,

With a rope men bownd the too,

Hard drawe and streynyd faste.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 181.

Sir Mungo, who watched his victim with the delighted yet wary eye of an experienced angler, became now aware that, if he strained the line on him too tightly, there was every risk of his breaking hold.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, xv.

3†. To confine; restrain; imprison.

There the steede in stoode strayed in bondes.

Atisander of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 1157.

4. To stretch to the utmost tension; put to the stretch; exert: as, to strain every nerve to accomplish something.

He sweats, strains his young nerves, and puts himself in posture That acts my words.

Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 3. 94.

5. To stretch beyond measure; push beyond the proper extent or limit; carry too far.

He strained the Constitution, but he conquered the Lords.

N. A. Rev., CXLII. 593.

6. To impair, weaken, or injure by stretching or overtasking; harm by subjection to too great stress or exertion; hence, to sprain.

Hold, sir, hold, pray use this whistle for me, I dare not straine my selfe to winde it I.

The Doctors tell me it will spend my spirits.

Brome, Sparagus Garden, iv. 7.

Prudes decay'd about may tack,

Strain their necks with looking back.

Swift.

7. To force; constrain.

Whether that Goddess worthy forwetyng

Streyneth me nedely for to don a thing.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 422.

The quality of mercy is not strain'd.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 184.

His mirth

Is forc'd and strain'd.

Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

8. To urge; press.

Note if your lady strain his entertainment With any strong or vehement importunity.

Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 250.

9. To press; squeeze; hence, to hug; embrace.

He that nyght in armes wold hire streyne

Harder than ever Paris did Eleyne.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 509.

I would have strain'd him with a strict embrace.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., x. 407.

10. To press through a filter or colander; separate extraneous or coarser matters from (a liquid) by causing it to pass through a filter or colander; purify from extraneous matter by filtration; filter: as, to strain milk.—11. To separate or remove by the use of a filter or colander: with out. See phrase under v. i., below.

Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.

Mat. xxiii. 24 [R. V.].

12†. To force out by straining.

I at each sad strain will strain a tear.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 1131.

13. To deform, as a solid body or structure.—To strain a point. See point.—To strain courtesy, to use ceremony; stand too much upon form or ceremony; insist on the precedence of others; hang back through excess of courtesy or civility.

My business was great; and in such a case as mine a man may strain courtesy.

Shak., R. and J., ii. 4. 55.

Strain not courtesies with a noble enemy.

Lamb, Two Races of Men.

= Syn. 10. Bolt, Screen, etc. See sift.

II. intrans. 1. To exert one's self; make violent efforts; strive.

To build his fortune I will strain a little.

Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 143.

What

Has made thy life so vile that thou shouldst strain

To forfeit it to me?

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 105.

2. To urge; press.

Nay, Sir, indeed the fault is yours most extreame now. Pray, sir, forbear to strain beyond a woman's patience.

Brome, Northern Lass, iii. 3.

3. To stretch strugglingly; stretch with effort.

This parlor looked out on the dark courtyard, in which there grew two or three poplars, straining upward to the light.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, iii.

No sound, no sight as far as eye could strain.

Browning, Childe Roland.

4. To undergo distortions under force, as a ship in a high sea.

A ship is said to strain if in launching, or when working in a heavy sea, the different parts of it experience relative motions.

Sir W. Thomson, in Phil. Trans., CXLVI. 431.

The ship ran

Straining, heeled o'er, through seas all changed and wan.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 10.

5. To drip; ooze; filter; drain; flow; issue; as, water straining through sand becomes pure.

Then, in the Deserts dry and barren sand,
From flinty Rocks doth plentiful Rivers strain.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Triumph of Faith, iii. 15.

To strain at, to strive after; endeavor to reach or obtain.

I do not strain at the position.

Shak., T. and C., iii. 3. 112.

To strain at a gnat, a typographical error found in the authorized version (Mat. xviii. 24) for strain out a gnat, the phrase found in Tyndale's and Coverdale's and other versions. See def. 11, above, and quotation there.

strain¹ (strān), n. [< strain¹, v. In some uses (def. 7), cf. strain².] 1^t. Stretch; extent; pitch.

If it did infect my blood with joy,
Or swell my thoughts to any strain of pride,
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 171.

May our Minerva
Answer your hopes, unto their largest strain!
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

2. Stretching or deforming force or pressure; violence. [This use of the word, while permissible in literature, is incorrect in mechanics. The strain is not the force, but the deformation produced by the force.]

A difference of taste in jokes is a great strain on the affections.
George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xv.

3. Tense or constrained state or condition; tension; great effort.

A dismal wedding! every ear at strain
Some sign of things that were to be gain.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 314.

Whether any poet . . . has exerted a greater variety of powers with less strain and less ostentation. Landor.

4. In mech., a definite change in the shape or size of a solid body setting up an elastic resistance, or stress, or exceeding the limit of elasticity. The deformation of a fluid is not commonly called a strain. The word, which had previously been ill-defined, was made a scientific and precise term in this sense by Rankine in 1850. Thomson and Tait, in their "Treatise on Natural Philosophy," extend the term to deformations of liquid masses, and even of groups of points; and Tait subsequently extends it to any geometrical figure, so that it becomes a synonym of deformation.

Fresnel made the very striking discovery that glass and other simply refracting bodies are rendered doubly refracting when in a state of strain. To this Brewster added the observation that the requisite strain might be produced by unequal heating instead of by mechanical stress.
Past, Light, § 292.

In this paper the word strain will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces.
Rankine, Axes of Elasticity (1855).

A strain is any definite alteration of form or dimensions experienced by a solid. . . . If a stone, a beam, or a mass of metal in a building, or in a piece of framework, becomes condensed or dilated in any direction, or bent, or twisted, or distorted in any way, it is said to experience a strain.
W. Thomson, Mathematical Theory of Elasticity (1856).

5. A stretching of the muscles or tendons, giving rise to subsequent pain and stiffness; sprain; wrench; twist.—6. A permanent deformation or injury of a solid structure.—7. Stretch; flight or burst, as of imagination, eloquence, or song. Specifically—(a) A poem; a song; a lay.

All unworthy of thy nobler strain.
Scott, L. of the L., I., Int.

(b) Tune; melody.
I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of death.
Milton, Comus, l. 561.

In sweet Italian Strains our Shepherds sing.
Congreve, Opening of the Queen's Theatre, Epil.

(c) In a stricter sense, in music, a section of a piece which is more or less complete in itself. In written music the strains are often marked by double bars.

An Cynthia had but seen me dance a strain, or do but one trick, I had been kept in court.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

(d) Tone; key; style or manner of speech or conduct.

The third [sort] is of such as take too high a strain at the first.
Bacon, Youth and Age (ed. 1887).

That sermon is in a strain which I believe has not been heard in this kingdom.
Burke, Rev. in France.

(e) Mood; disposition.

Henry . . . said, "I am come, young ladies, in a very moralizing strain, to observe that our pleasures in this world are always to be paid for."
Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xxvi.

Axes of a homogeneous strain, three straight lines of particles perpendicular to one another both before and after the strain.—Composition of strains. See composition of displacements, under composition.—Concurrent stress and strain. See concurrent.—Homogeneous or uniform strain, a strain which leaves every straight line of particles straight, and every pair of parallel lines parallel.—Longitudinal strain. See longitudinal.—Normal plane of a homogeneous strain, one of three planes each containing two of the three axes. There is generally only one such system of planes through each point of the body.—Orthogonal strain. (a) Relatively to a stress, a strain which neither does nor uses work by virtue of that stress. (b) Relatively to another strain, a strain orthogonal to a stress perfectly concurrent to the other strain.—

Principal strain. Same as principal strain-type (which see, under strain-type).—Pure strain, a homogeneous strain which does not rotate any axis of the strain.—Simple strain, any one of a number of strains conceived as independent components of other strains which they are employed to define. The phrase simple strain has no definite meaning, but simple longitudinal strain, simple tangential strain, simple shearing strain, etc., mean such strains existing not as components merely, but as resultants. Thus, if a bar is elongated without any transverse contraction or expansion, there is a simple longitudinal strain in the direction of the elongation. A simple tangential strain is a homogeneous strain in which all the particles are displaced parallel to one plane.—Strain-ellipsoid. See ellipsoid.—To heave a strain. See heave.—Type of a strain. See type.

strain² (strān), n. [An altered form, due appar. to confusion with strain¹, 7, of what would be reg. streen; < ME. streen, strene, stren, earlier streon, istreon, race, stock, generation, < AS. gestreōn, gestrion, gain, wealth (= OS. gistrūni, = OHG. gistrūni, gain, property, wealth, business); appar. confused in ME. with the related noun, ME. strend, strynd, strand, < AS. strynd, race, stock; < streonan, stryjan = OHG. striunan, beget, gestreōnan, get, acquire.] 1. Race; stock; generation; descent; hence, family blood; quality or line as regards breeding; breed; a race or breed; a variety, especially an artificial variety, of a domestic animal. Strain indicates the least recognizable variation from a given stock, or the ultimate modification to which an animal has been subjected. But since such variation usually proceeds by insensible degrees, the significance of strain grades into that of breed, race, or variety.

Bountee comth al of God, nat of the streen
Of which they been engendered and ybore.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 101.

O, if thou wert the noblest of thy strain,
Young man, thou couldst not die more honourable.
Shak., J. C., v. 1. 59.

The ears of a cat vary in shape, and certain strains, in England, inherit a pencil-like tuft of hairs, above a quarter of an inch in length, on the tips of their ears.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, i.

2. Hereditary or natural disposition; turn; tendency; character.

Sir, you have shown to-day your valiant strain.
Shak., Lear, v. 3. 40.

And here I shall not restrain righteousness to the particular virtue of justice, but enlarge it according to the genius and strain of the book of the Proverbs. Tillotson.

3. Sort; kind; style.
Let man learn a prudence of a higher strain.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 214.

4. Trace; streak.

With all his merit there was a strain of weakness in his character.
Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 6.

5. The shoot of a tree. Halliwel (under strene). [Prov. Eng.]—6^t. The track of a deer.

When they haue shot a Deere by land, they follow him like blood-hounds by the blood, and straine, and oftentimes so take them. Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 134.

strain³ (strān), v. t. [An aphetic form of distrain.] To restrain.

When my lord refused to pay the two shillings, Mr. Knightly charged the constable to strain two shillings' worth of goods. Court and Times of Charles I., I. 56.

strainable (strā'na-bl), a. [Early mod. E. streynable, streynable; < strain¹ + -able.] 1^t. Constraining; compelling; violent.

This yere the Duke of Burgon, . . . with his xii. M. men, was dryuen in to Englowd, with a ferse streynable wynde, in ther selynge towarde Spayn.
Arnold's Chron. (1502), p. xliii.

2. Capable of being strained.

strainably† (strā'na-bli), adv. [Early mod. E. streynable; < strainable + -ly.] Violently; fiercely.

The wind . . . drone the flame so streynable amongst the tents and cabins of the Saxons, that the fire . . . increased the feare amongst the souldiours wonderfullie.
Holinshed, Hist. Scotland, p. 95.

strained¹ (strānd), p. a. [< strain¹ + -ed¹.] Forced; carried beyond proper limits; as, a strained interpretation of a law.

strained² (strānd), a. [< strain² + -ed².] Of this or that strain or breed, as an animal.

strainer (strā'nēr), n. [< ME. streynour, strenyore; < strain¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who or that which strains.—2. A stretcher or tightener; as, a strainer for wire fences.—3. Any utensil for separating small solid particles from the liquid that contains them, either to preserve the solid objects or to clarify the liquid, or for both purposes.

Item, j. dressyng knyfe, j. fyre schowle, ij. treys, j. streynour.
Paston Letters, I. 490.

4. In carriage-building: (a) A reinforcing strip or button at the back of a panel. (b) Canvas glued to the back of a panel to prevent warping or cracking. Also called stretchers.—Strainer of Hippocrates. Same as Hippocrates's sleeve (which see, under sleeve).

strainer-vine (strā'nēr-vīn), n. The sponge-gourd, Luffa acutangula, and other species; so called from the use of the fibrous network contained in its fruit for straining palm-wine.

straining (strā'ning), n. [Verbal n. of strain¹, v.] In saddlery, leather, canvas, or other fabric drawn over a saddle to form a base for the seating. It is put on the saddle with a tool called a straining-fork, the fabric having first been stretched on a machine called a straining-reel. Also called straining-leather.—Cross-straining, canvas or webbing drawn transversely over the first straining.

straining-beam (strā'ning-bēm), n. In a queen-post roof, a horizontal beam uniting the tops of the two queen-posts, and acting as a tie-rod to resist the thrust of the roof; a straining-piece. If a similar beam is placed on the main tie-rod, between the bases of the posts, it is called a straining-sill.

straining-leather (strā'ning-leth'ēr), n. In saddlery, same as straining.

straining-piece (strā'ning-pēs), n. Same as straining-beam.

straining-sill (strā'ning-sil), n. See straining-beam.

strain-normal (strā'nōr'māl), n. A normal of a homogeneous strain.

strain-sheet (strā'n'shēt), n. In bridge-building, a skeleton drawing of a truss or other part of a bridge, with the calculated or computed greatest strain to which it will be subjected annotated at the side of each member. In making the actual working-drawings, the respective members are drawn to a size sufficient to sustain the stresses so marked on the sheet multiplied by a certain predetermined "factor of safety." Also called stress-sheet.

strait† (strānt), n. [< OF. estrainte, estreinte, fem. of estraint, F. étreint, pp. of OF. estreindre, F. étreindre, strain: see strain¹, v., and cf. restrain, constrain.] A violent stretching or tension; a strain; pressure; constraint.

Upon his iron collar griped fast,
That with the strait his wessand nigh he brast.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ii. 14.

strain-type (strān'tīp), n. The type of a strain.—Principal strain-type, one of six strain-types such that, when the homogeneous elastic solid to which they belong is homogeneously strained in any way, the potential energy of the elasticity is expressed by the sum of the products of the squares of the components of the strain expressed in terms of these strain-types, each multiplied by a determinate coefficient.

strait¹ (strāt), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also straight, streight, stret, etc.; < ME. strait, strayt, straite, strayte, stret, streit, streite, also sometimes straight, < OF. estroit, estrait (F. étroit), narrow, strict (as a noun, a narrow passage of water), = Pr. estreit = Sp. estrecho = Pg. estreito = It. stretto, narrow, strict, < L. strictus, pp. of stringere, draw tight: see strain¹, stringent. Cf. strict, which is a doublet of strait, the one being directly from the L., the other through OF. and ME. The word strait¹, formerly also spelled straight, has been more or less confused with the diff. word straight¹, which was sometimes spelled strait¹.] I. a. 1. Narrow; having little breadth or width.

Egypt is a long Contree; but it is streyt, that is to say narrow; for they may not enlarge it toward the Desert, for default of Watre.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 45.

Strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. Mat. vii. 14.

Britons seen, all flying
Through a strait lane. Shak., Cymbeline, v. 3. 7.

2. Confined; restricted; limited in space or accommodation; close.

There was swich congregacioun
Of perle, and eek so streit of herbergeage,
That they ne founde as much as o cotage
In which they bothe myghte ylogged be.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 169.

And the sons of the prophets said unto Elisha, Behold now, the place where we dwell with thee is too strait for us. 2 Ki. vi. 1.

3^t. Of time, short; scant.

If thi nede be greet & thi tyme streite,
Than go thi silf therto & worche an houswijfes brayde.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 41.

4^t. Tight.
You rode, like a kern of Ireland, your French hose off, and in your strait strossers. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 7. 57.

He [man] might see that a strait glove will come more easily on with use.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 295.

I denounce against all strait Lacing, squeezing for a Shape.
Congreve, Way of the World, iv. 5.

5^t. Close. (a) Near; intimate; familiar.

He, forgetting all former injuries, had received that naughty Plexirtus into a straight degree of favour, his goodness being as apt to be deceived as the other's craft was to deceive. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii. (Latham.)

(b) Strict; careful.

6. Strait; the straits; exacting.
It was old and some did strait
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 174.
After the most straitest sort of our religion I lived a Plattus.
When I believe to be most strait in virtue.
Shak., M. for M., II. i. 9.

Let a strait life in continence and austerity, and was therefore admitted as a Prophet, and resorted to out of all parts.
Purchar, Pilgrimage, p. 379.
Bound them by so strait vows.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

7†. Sore; great; difficult; distressing.
At a strait neede they can wele stanche bloode.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 17.

8†. Hard-pressed; straitened; hampered.
Mother, I kindly thank you for your Orange Pills you sent me. If you are not too strait of money, send me some such thing by the woman, and a pound or two of Almonds and Raisons.
Strype, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 178.
To make your strait circumstances yet straiter.
Secker, Sermons, II. xi.

II. n. 1. A narrow pass or passage.
Thei rode forth the softe pas strait and clos till they come to the strait be-tweene the wode and the river, as the kynge looke hadde them taught Mertin (E. E. T. S.), II. 160.
The barbarous people lay in wait for him in his way,
in the strait of Thermopyles.
North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 394.
Honour travels in a strait so narrow,
Where one but goes abreast.
Shak., T. and C., III. 3. 154.

2. Specifically, a narrow passage of water connecting two bodies of water; often used in the plural; as, the Strait or Straits of Gibraltar;
the Straits of Magellan; the Straits of Dover.
Abbreviated St.—3. A strip of land between two bodies of water; an isthmus.
A broken channel with a broken cross,
That stood on a dark strait of barren land:
On one side lay the Ocean, and on one Lay a great water. Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

4†. A narrow alley in London.
Look into any angle of the town, the Strights, or the Bermudas, where the quarrelling lesson is read, and how do they entertain the time, but with bottle-ale and tobacco?
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, II. 6.
Cant names then given to the places frequented by bullies, knights of the post, and fencing masters. . . .
These Strights consisted of a nest of obscure courts, alleys, and avenues, running between the bottom of St. Martin's Lane, Half-Moon, and Chandos Street.
Gifford's Note at "Bermudas" in the above passage.

5. A tight or narrow place; difficulty; distress;
need; ease of necessity: often in the plural.
Finding himself out of straits, he will revert to his customs.
Bacon, Expense (ed. 1837).
The straits and needs of Catiline being such
As he must fight with one of the two armies.
B. Jonson, Catiline, v. 6.
Take me; I'll serve you better in a strait.
Tennyson, Princess, i.

6†. pl. Cloth of single width, as opposed to broad cloth: a term in use in the sixteenth century and later.—Between the Straits, through and beyond the Straits of Gibraltar: used by American sailors with reference to a voyage to Mediterranean ports;
as, he has made two voyages between the Straits.—Peri-neal strait. See perineal.—Straits of the pelvis, in obstet., the openings of the pelvic canal, distinguished as the superior and inferior straits. See pelvis.—Straits oil.
See oil.

strait† (strāt), v. t. [Also straight; < strait†, a.] 1. To make strait or narrow; narrow;
straiten; contract.
He [Lassus] set his ranks wide, casting his soldiers into a square battell. . . . Yet afterward he changed his mind againe, and straighted the battell [formation] of his footmen, fashioning it like a brick, more long than broad, making a front and shewing their faces every way.
North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 477.

2. To stretch; draw tight; tighten.
This weighty Scott sail strait a rope,
And hanged he shall be.
John Donne, Sermons, Ch. 11, Ballads, IV. 273.

3. To press hard; put to difficulties; distress;
puzzle; perplex.
Interpretation should abuse, and call this
Your lack of love or bounty, you were straited
Purchar, Pilgrimage, p. 379.

strait† (strāt), adv. [< ME. streite, streyte; < strait†, a.] Narrowly; tightly; closely; strictly; rigorously; strenuously; hard.

Hir hosen weren of fyn scarlet reed
Ful streite yteyd.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 457.

Worcester sayd at Castré it schuld be necessary for ȝow to have good witnesse, as he saythe it schuld go streythe with ȝow wythout ȝowr witnesse were ȝythe sofyeynt.
Paston Letters, l. 516.

strait†, a. and adv. An old spelling of straight†.
straiten (strāt'n), v. t. [Formerly also straighten; < strait† + -en†.] 1. To make strait or narrow; narrow; contract; diminish.
Let not young beginners in religion . . . straiten their liberty by vows of long continence.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iv. 7.

2. To confine; hem in.
Feed him henceforth, man, and no more be straiten'd
Within the limits of an empty patience
Ford, Fancies, iv. 1.

3. To draw tight; tighten.
My horses here detain,
Fix'd to the chariot by the straiten'd rein.
Pope, Iliad, v. 325.

4. To hamper; inconvenience; restrict.
An other time having straighten'd [var. straighted] his enemies with scarcity of victuals.
North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 495.

2. pl. An infectious catarrh of the upper air-passages, especially the nasal cavity, of the horse, ass, and mule, associated with suppuration of the submaxillary and other lymphatic glands. The disease usually attacks young animals.
Enfeebled health, exposure, and neglect are predisposing causes. It may appear as an epizootic in large stables.
The mortality is from 2 to 3 per cent. The disease begins with fever and a serous discharge from the nose, which later becomes viscid. At the same time a swelling appears under the jaws, indicating inflammation and suppuration of the submaxillary glands. The disease ordinarily lasts several weeks. Complications may, however, appear. The throat and neighboring lymphatics may become involved and the infection extend to various parts of the system, giving rise to pyemia. Specific bacteria (Streptococci) have been found in the suppurating glands.

strangulate (strang-gū-lāt), a. [L. strangula-tus, pp. of strangulare, strangle; see strangle.]
Same as strangled.

strangulate (strang-gū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp.
strangulated, ppp. strangling. [*L. strangula-
tus*, pp. of strangulare, strangle; see strangle.]
To strangle; in pathol., to compress so as to suppress the function of a part, as a loop of intestine, a vessel, or a nerve. See strangled.

Creepers of literature, who suck their food, like the ivy, from what they strangle and kill.

Southey, Doctor, Interchapter vii. (Davies.)

A strong double ligature was passed through this part of the cheek, with the intention of strangulating the projection, a tubercle of tumor, at its base.

J. M. Cureson, Operative Surgery, p. 47.

strangled (strang-gū-lāt), p. a. 1. In pathol., compressed so as to suppress the function of a part; as, a hernia is said to be stran-gulated when it is so compressed as to obstruct the circulation in the part and cause dangerous symptoms. 2. In bot., contracted and expanded in an irregular manner.—3. In entom., constricted; much narrowed: especially noting the thorax or abdomen when constricted in one or more places, as in many ants.—Stran-gulated hernia. See def. 1 and hernia.

strangulation (strang-gū-lā'shon), n. [F. strangulation = Sp. estrangulacion = Pg. estrangula-ção = It. strangolazione, < L. strangula-tio (-n), a choking, a suffocating, < strangulare,
pp. strangulatus, choke, suffocate; see strangle.]

1. The act or state of strangling; a sudden and violent compression of the windpipe, constriction being applied directly to the neck, either around it or in the fore part, or from within the esophagus, so as to prevent the passage of air, and thereby suspend respiration and, if the constriction is prolonged, destroy life.—2. In pathol., the state of a part too closely constricted, as the intestine in strangulated hernia.—3. Excessive or abnormal constriction of any kind.

At the point where the strangulation takes place the glacier lies in a kind of basin, of which the lower lip presents proofs of the most intense erosion.

A. Geikie, Geol. Sketches, vi.

strangurious (strang-gū'ri-us), a. [LL. stran-gurius, affected with strangury, < L. stranguria, strangury; see strangury.] Affected with strangury; of the nature of strangury; noting the pain of strangury.

strangury (strang-gū'ri), n. [F. strangurie =
OSp. estrangurria, Sp. estranguria = Pg. estranguria = It. stranguria, < L. stranguria, < Gr. στράγγω, retention of urine, < στράγγω (στράγγω), a drop, that which is squeezed out (< στράγγω, draw or bind tight, squeeze; see strangle), + οὔρειν, urinate, < οὔρον, urine.] 1. Scanty micturition with painful sense of spasm.

He, growing ancient, became sick of the stone, or stran-gury, whereof, after his suffering of much dolorous pain, he fell asleep in the Lord.

N. Morton, New England's Memorial, p. 262.

2. In hort., a disease in plants produced by tight ligatures.

strap (strap), n. [Also, more orig., strop, dial.
strophe (the form strop being also in reg. E. use in some senses); < ME. stroppe, strobe, < AS. stroppe = MD. strop, strop, D. strop = MLG. strop = MHG. strupfe, strüppe, G. struppe, strüppe, strüppe = Sw. stroppe = Dan. stroppe, a strap, = OF. estrope, F. étrope = Sp. Pg. estrovo, an oar-thong, < L. stroppeus, stroppus, a thong, strap, fillet, akin to Gr. στρόφιον, a twisted band, < στρόφω, twist; see strophe. Doublet of strop.]

1. A narrow strip of leather or other flexible material, generally used for some mechanical purpose, as to surround and hold together, or to retain in place. In ordinary use straps are most frequently of leather, and are often used with one or more buckles, or a buckle and slide, allowing of a more or less close adjustment of the strap. See cut under shot-pouch.
Specifically—(a) Naut.: (1) A piece of rope with the ends spliced together, used for attaching a tackle to anything or for slinging any weight to be lifted. (2) A ring of rope or band of iron put round a block or deadeye, suspending it or holding it in place. Sometimes spelled strop. (b) A razor-strap. See razor-strap and strop. (c) An ornament like a strap; a shoulder-strap. See shoulder-strap, 2.

2. A long and narrow piece of thin iron or other metal used to hold different parts together, as of a frame or the sides of a box; a leaf of a hinge; in carp., an iron plate for connecting two or more timbers, to which it is bolted or screwed.—3. In bot., the ligule in florets of Compositæ (see ligule); also, in some grasses, the leaf exclusive of its sheath.—4. A string. [Scotch.]

They winna string the like o' him up as they do the puir whig bodies that they catch in the mairs, like straps o' onions.

Scott, Old Mortality, x.

5. Credit; originally, credit for drink. [Slang.]

6. In a vehicle: (a) A plate on the upper side of the tongue and resting upon the doubletree, to aid in holding the wagon-hammer. (b)
A clip, such as that which holds a spring to the spring-bar or to the axle. (c) The stirrupshaped piece of a clevis. E. H. Knight.—7.
A strap-oyster.

strap (strap), v. t.; pret. and pp. strapped, ppp.
strapping. [Strap, n.] 1. To fasten or bind with a strap: especially in the sense of compressing and holding very closely: often with up or down.

He carries white thread gloves, sports a cane, has his trousers tightly strapped.

W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 49.

2. To beat or chastise with a strap. [Colloq.]

3. To sharpen with a strap; strop, as a razor.

I shouldn't wonder if we had a snow-storm before it's over. Molly said Puck, strapping his knife on the edge of the belt.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 17.

4. To hang. [Scotch.]

Woe! I wot it's a crime, baith by the law of God and man, and mony a pretty man has been strapped for it [murder].

Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xiv.

To be or become strapped, to lose one's money; be bankrupt or out of money. [Slang.]—To strap a dead-eye, to fasten a strap of rope or iron round a block, dead-eye, or bull's-eye.

strap-bolt (strap'bōlt), n. Same as lug-bolt.
strap-game (strap'gām), n. A swindling trick otherwise known as prick the garter, prick at the loop, and fast and loose (which see, under fast, a.).

strap-head (strap'hed), n. In mach., a journal-box formed at the end of a connecting-rod.

strap-hinge (strap'hin), n. See hinge.

strap-joint (strap'joint), n. In mach., a connection formed by a strap, key, and gib, as on the end of a pitman. E. H. Knight.

strap-laid (strap'lād), a. Noting a flat rope made by placing two or more strands of hawser-laid rope side by side, piercing them laterally, and binding them together by twine inserted through the pierced holes.

strap-mounts (strap'mounts), n. pl. The buckles, chapes, slides, etc., with which leather straps are fitted.

strap-oil (strap'oīl), n. A beating. [Humorous.] strap-oyster (strap'oīs'tēr), n. A long slender oyster which grows upright in mud. Also called stuck-up, stick-up, coon-heel, shanghai, razor-blade, rabbitear, etc. [New Jersey.]

strappado (stra-pā'dō), n. [Formerly also strapado; < OF. strapade, F. estrapade = Sp. estrapada = It. strappata, < strappare, pull.] A punishment or torture which consisted in raising the victim to a certain height by a rope and letting him fall suddenly, the rope being secured to his person in such a way that the jerk in falling would inflict violent pain. For example, the hands being tied together, the rope would be secured to the wrists; the punishment was more severe when the arms had previously been brought behind the back.

We presently determined rather to seek our liberties then to be in danger for ever to be slaves in the country, for it was told us we should have ye strappado.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 253.

They've also the Strappado, hoisting them vp and downe by the armes with a cord. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 441.

strappado (stra-pā'dō), v. t. [strappado, n.]
To torture by the strappado.

Oh, to redeem me here,
I would have this hand cut off, these my breasts sear'd,
Be back'd, strappado'd, put to any torment.

Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, ed. 1874, II. 141).

strapper (strap'ēr), n. [strap + -ēr.] 1.
One who has to do with straps; specifically, one who has charge of the harnessing of horses.

Men who, though nothing but strappers, call themselves grooms. Encyc. Brit., XII. 195.

2. Anything bulky; a large, tall person. [Colloq.]

A strapper—a real strapper, Jane; big, brown, and buxom; with hair just such as the ladies of Carthage must have had.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xx.

strapping¹ (strap'ing), n. [Verbal n. of strap, v.] 1. The act of fastening with a strap.—2.
A beating; a whipping. [Colloq.].—3. Material for straps, or straps in general.

Securing the loose flaps of the lip with pieces of strapping.

Lancet, 1890, I. 183.

strapping² (strap'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of strap, v., used, like thumping, whacking, whopping, bouncing, and other participial adjectives expressing violent action, to denote something of impressively large size.] Tall; lusty; robust.
[Colloq.]

Then that t'other great strapping Lady—I can't hit off her Name.

Congreve, Double-Dealer, iii. 10.

strapping-plate (strap'ing-plāt), n. In mining, one of the wrought-iron plates by which the spears of a pump-rod are bolted together. Also called spear-plate.

strapplet (strap'lē), v. t. [Freq. of strap, v.]
To bind with a strap; strap; entangle.

His ruin started th' other steeds, the gears crack'd, and the reins

Strappled his fellows. Chapman, Iliad, xvi. 438.

strap-rail (strap'rāl), n. A flat rail laid upon a continuous longitudinal sleeper.

strap-shaped (strap'shāpt), a. Ligulate; shaped like a strap: used especially of the rays of the tubuliferous and the corollas of the liguliferous Compositæ.

strap-skein (strap'skēn), n. In carriage-building, a flat strip of iron let into the wood of an axle-arm to protect it from wear.

strap-work (strap'wērk), n. Architectural ornament consisting of a narrow fillet or band represented as folded and crossed, and occasionally interlaced with another.

strap-worm (strap'wôrm), n. A cestoid worm of the family Ligulidae.

strawwort (strap'wôrt), n. A sea-coast plant of the Mediterranean region and western Europe, Corrigiola littoralis, of the Illecebracea. It is an herb with numerous slender trailing stems, suggesting the name, and small white flowers in little heads or cymes, the sepals petal-like on the margin.

Strasburg finch, pâté, ware, etc. See finch 1, etc.

strass (stras), n. [So called from the name of the German inventor, Josef Strasser.] 1. Same as paste 1, 3.—2. The refuse of silk left in making up skeins. E. H. Knight.

strata, n. Plural of stratum.

stratagem (strat'a-jem), n. [Formerly also strategem; early mod. E. strategem; < OF. stratageme, F. stratagème = Sp. estratagemma = Pg. estratagemma, stratagemma = It. stratagemma (in Rom. erroneously spelled with a in the second orig. syllable), < L. strategema, < Gr. στρατηγema, the act of a general, a piece of generalship, < στρατηγος, be a general, command an army, < στρατηγός, a general, the leader or commander of an army: see strategy.] 1. An artifice in war; a plan or scheme for deceiving an enemy.

The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils.

Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 85.

He [Henry V.] never fought battle, nor won town, wherein he prevailed not as much by Strategem as by Force. Baker, Chronicles, p. 179.

2. Any artifice; a trick by which some advantage is intended to be obtained.

Ambition is full of distractions; it teems with stratagems, and is swelled with expectations as with a tympany. Jer. Taylor.

It is an honest stratagem to take advantage of ourselves.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 13.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Artifice, Maneuver, Trick, etc. See artifice—2. Deception, plot, trap, device, snare, dodge, contrivance.

stratagematic (strat'a-je-mat'ik), a. [< OF. stratagematicus, < NL. strategematus*, < (Gr. στρατηγικός), a stratagem: see stratagem.] Using stratagem; skilled in strategy. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie (ed. Arber), p. 35. [Rare.]

stratagematically (strat'a-je-mat'ik-al-i), adv. By stratagem or artifice. G. Harvey, Four Letters.

stratagemic (strat-a-jem'ik), a. [< stratagem + -ic.] Containing or characterized by stratagem or artifice. [Rare.]

stratagemical (strat-a-jem'ik-al), a. [< stratagemic + -al.] Same as stratagemic. Colgrave; Swift (?), Tripos, iii.

stratharithmetry (strat-a-rith'me-tri), n. [Irreg. < Gr. στρατός, an army, + ἀριθμός, a number (see arithmetical), + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] Milit., the art of drawing up an army or body of men in a geometrical figure, or of estimating or expressing the number of men in such a figure. Imp. Diet.

strategetic (strat-ē-jet'ik), a. [< Gr. στρατηγικός, pertaining to the command of an army, < στρατηγός, be a general, command an army: see stratagem.] Same as strategic.

strategetical (strat-ē-jet'ik-al), a. [< strategetic + -al.] Same as strategetic.

strategetically (strat-ē-jet'ik-al-i), adv. In a strategetical manner.

strategetics (strat-ē-jet'iks), n. [Pl. of strategetic (see -ics).] Same as strategy.

strategi, n. Plural of strategus, 1.

strategic (stra-tej'ik), a. [= F. stratégique, < LL. strategicus* (in neut. pl. strategica, the deeds of a general), < Gr. στρατηγικός, of or pertaining to a general, < στρατηγός, a general: see stratagem, and cf. strategy.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of strategy; demanded by, used in, or characterized by strategy; as, strategic movements.—Strategic battle. See battle, 1.

strategical (stra-tej'ik-al), a. [< strategic + -al.] Same as strategic.

strategically (stra-tej'ik-al-i), adv. In a strategical manner; as regards strategy.

strategies (stra-tej'iks), n. [Pl. of strategic (see -ics).] Same as strategy.

strategist (strat'ē-jist), n. [= F. stratégiste; as strategy + -ist.] One skilled in strategy.

He [Milton] was a strategist rather than a drill-sergeant in verse, capable, beyond any other English poet, of putting great masses through the most complicated evolutions without clash or confusion, but he was not curious that every foot should be at the same angle.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 286.

strategus (stra-tē'gus), n. [< L. strategus, < Gr. στρατηγός, the commander of an army, a general: see strategy.] 1. Pl. strategi (-ji). A military commander in ancient Greece: as, Diæus was strategus of the Achean League.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Hope, 1837).] In entom., a genus of large American scarabæid beetles, whose males usually have three prothoracic horns. They are mainly tropical and subtropical, but S. antæus extends north to Massachusetts.—3. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of mollusks.

strategy (strat'ē-ji), n. [< OF. strategie, F. stratégie = Sp. estrategia = It. strategia, strategy (cf. L. strategia, a government, province), < Gr. στρατηγία, the office or dignity of a commander, generalship, a pretorship, government, province, < στρατηγός, the leader or commander of an army, a general, a governor, pretor, consul, < στρατός, an army, host, soldiery (prop. an encamped army, lit. 'scattered, spread' (= L. stratus, scattered, spread), < σπρηννύμι = L. sternere (pp. stratus), scatter, spread, strew: see stratum), + ἀγέω, lead (see agent).] 1. The science of combining and employing the means which the different branches of the art of war afford, for the purpose of forming projects of operations and of directing great military movements; the art of moving troops so as to be enabled either to dispense with a battle or to deliver one with the greatest advantage and with the most decisive results; generalship. In strategy three things demand especial consideration: (1) the base of operations, or line from which an army commences its advance upon an enemy; (2) the objective, or objective point, the point which it aims to possess, or the object which it strives to attain; (3) the line of operations, or that line which an army must pass over to attain its objective point. When an army assumes a strictly defensive attitude, the base of operations becomes the line of defense, and in a retrograde movement the line of operations becomes the line of retreat. Strategical points are the points of operations of an army—namely, points whose occupation secures an undoubted advantage to the army holding them for offensive and defensive purposes, and points which it is the chief object of an army to attain. The theater of operations comprises the territory to be invaded or defended by an army. It includes the base of operations, the objective point, the front of operations, the lines of operation, the lines of communication which connect the several lines of operations, obstacles, natural or artificial, lines of retreat, and places of refuge. The front of operations is the length of the line in advance of the base of operations covered or occupied by an army.

2. The use of artifice, finesse, or stratagem for the carrying out of any project.

strath (strath), n. [< Gael. srath = Ir. srath, sratha = W. ystrad, a valley; perhaps connected with street, ult. < L. strata: see street.] In Scotland, a valley of considerable size, often having a river running through it and giving it its distinctive appellation: as, Strathspey (the valley of the Spey), Strathearn (the valley of the Earn), and Strathmore (the great valley).

strathspey (strath-spā'), n. [So called from Strathspey in Scotland.] 1. A Scotch dance, invented early in the eighteenth century, resembling the reel, but slower, and marked by numerous sudden jerks.

While youths and maids the light strathspey
So nimbly danced, with Highland glee!

Scott, Glenfinlas.

2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is duple, moderately rapid, and abounding in the rhythmic or metric figure called the Scotch snap or catch (which see, under Scotch 1), or its converse.

stratulate (strā-tik'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. straticulatus*, < straticulum*, dim. of stratum, a layer: see stratum.] Arranged in thin layers, as a banded agate.

stratification (strat'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [= F. stratification = Sp. estratificación = It. stratificazione; as stratify + -ation.] 1. The act of stratifying, or the state of being stratified; formation or arrangement in layers.

It was formerly the practice in England, as it still is on the Continent, to tan by the process of stratification, for which purpose a bed of bark is made upon the bottom of the pit; upon this is laid the hide, then bark, then a hide, and so on until the pit is full. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 385.

2. Specifically, in geol., deposition in beds or strata; the mode of occurrence of those rocks which have been laid down or spread over the surface by water. The most important indication and result of stratification is that the rock separates more or less easily along the planes separating the beds or strata. Each stratification-plane marks a change in the character of the deposit, or a shorter or longer period during which deposition was suspended. Often one stratum is succeeded by another of quite different character, showing a change in the existing conditions. Sometimes, however, a rock is distinctly stratified, but each stratum separates easily into much thinner layers, closely resembling one another in petrographic character: this is generally called lamination.

In some cases the apparent stratification seems to be of the nature of an imperfect cleavage, there having been a certain amount of rearrangement of the particles of the rock parallel to the planes of deposition. See cuts under Artesian and erosion.

3. In physiol., the thickening of a cell-wall by the deposition of successive thin layers of formed material; also, the arrangement of the layers so deposited.

It is now known that stratification is due to a subsequent change in the amount of water of organization present in particular parts of the [cell] wall. Bessey, Botany, p. 33.

4. In elect., the appearance presented by an electric discharge, or a series of rapid discharges, in a rarefied gas, light and dark bands or striæ being produced.

stratified (strat'i-fid), p. a. Arranged or disposed in layers or strata: as, stratified rocks. See cut under erosion.—Stratified cartilage, ordinary white fibrocartilage.—Stratified epithelium. See epithelium.—Stratified thallus, in lichens, a thallus in which the gonidia, or algal cells, are disposed in one or more layers, thus producing stratification. See heteromorphous, (c) (2).

stratiform (strat'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. stratum, a layer, + forma, form.] Forming or formed into a layer or lamella; embedded as a stratum or layer; stratified: specifically used in the anatomy of a form of cartilage.—Stratiform cartilage or fibrocartilage, a layer of cartilage embedded in a groove of bone along which the tendon of a muscle plays: referring not to a special kind of cartilage, but to the particular form in which it is arranged. The cartilage lining the bicipital groove of the humerus, on which the tendon of the long head of the biceps glides, is an example.

stratify (strat'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. stratified, ppr. stratifying. [= F. stratifier = It. stratificare, < NL. stratum, a layer, + L. facere, make, do.] To form into a layer or layers, as substances in the earth; lay or arrange in strata.

stratigrapher (strā-tig'ra-fēr), n. [< stratigraph-y + -er.] One who devotes himself to the study of stratigraphical geology. Nature, XLIII. 142.

stratigraphic (strat-i-graf'ik), a. [< stratigraph-y + -ic.] Having to do with the order of succession, mode of occurrence, and general geological character of the series of stratified rocks of which the earth's crust is largely composed.

stratigraphical (strat-i-graf'ik-al), a. [< stratigraphic + -al.] Same as stratigraphic.

stratigraphically (strat-i-graf'ik-al-i), adv. In a stratigraphic manner; as regards stratigraphy, or the disposition of strata.

stratigraphist (strā-tig'ra-fist), n. [< stratigraph-y + -ist.] One who studies stratigraphy; a stratigrapher. Nature, XXXVIII. 506.

stratigraphy (strā-tig'ra-fi), n. [< NL. stratum, a layer, + Gr. γράφω, < γράφω, write.] In geol., order and position of the stratified groups; all that part of geological science which is not specially theoretical or paleontological; general descriptive geology.

Stratiomyia (strat'i-ō-mī'i-ä), n. [NL. (Macquart, 1838), orig. Stratiomyis (Geoffroy, 1764), also Stratiomya (Schiner, 1868), Stratiomis (Schelling, 1803), Stratiomyis (J. E. Gray, 1832); irreg. < Gr. στρατός, a soldier, + μύια, a fly.] The typical genus of the family Stratiomyidae. They are medium-sized or rather large flies of dark color with light spots or stripes. The larvae live in mud or damp sand, and the flies are found upon unbelliferous and other flowers growing near water. About 40 species are known in North America, and about 20 in Europe. They are sometimes called chameleon-flies, from the name of one species, S. chameleon.

Stratiomyidae (strat'i-ō-mī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819, as Stratiomyidæ), < Stratiomyia + -idæ.] A family of true flies, belonging to the brachycerous Diptera and to the section Notacantha. It is a large and wide-spread family; about 200 species occur in North America. They vary much in size and color, and have a large hemispherical head, flattened or convex abdomen, and tibiae usually without spurs. They are mostly flower-flies, and are often found upon vegetation in damp places.

Stratioteæ (strat-i-ō'tē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1829), < Stratiotes + -eæ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Hydrocharidæ and series Glycydræ. It is characterized by a very short stem bearing crowded sessile submerged leaves and usually also long-petioled floating leaves, by peduncled spathes, and by one-celled ovaries spuriously six-celled by intrusion of the lobed placenta. It includes five genera, of which Stratiotes is the type. (See also Hydrocharis.) The others are mostly tropical plants of fresh water, with ovate-oblong or broadly cordate floating leaves and ribbed or winged spathes.

Stratiotes (strat-i-ō'tēz), n. [NL. (in def. 1 (Linnaeus, 1737) so called from the sword-like leaves), < Gr. στράτις, se. στρατήρ, an Egyptian water-plant, by some said to have been the water-lettuce, Pistia Stratiotes; lit. 'river-sol-strawberry (strā'ber^{er}), n.; pl. strawberries (-iz). [*< ME. strawbery, strauberi, strabery, strawberi, strebery, streberi, strebere, also (in comp. strawberry, strobery, < AS. stræwberie, stredwberige, also contracted stræuberie, stræberige, stredberge, also streowberge, streuberie, late AS. stræberie (in comp.), strawberry (also called eorthberie, G. erdbeere, 'earth-berry'), < stredw straw, + berie, berry: see straw¹ and berry. The first element, lit. 'straw,' is very rare in AS. use, and its exact application here is uncertain. It may be taken in the sense of 'long stem,' referring to the runners of the plant, or it may allude to an old habit of stringing the berries on a straw. The word is often erroneously explained as a corruption of a supposed stragberry*, or even as referring to the common use of straw or hay about the plants to keep the earth from soiling the berries. No corresponding name appears in the other languages. Cf. strawberry-wise.] The fruit of any of the species of the genus Fragaria, or the plant itself. The plants are stemless, propagating by slender runners (whence they are often called strawberry vines), with trifoliate leaves, and scapes a few inches high bearing mostly white-petaled flowers in small cymes, followed by the "berry," which consists of an enlarged fleshy receptacle, colored scarlet or other shade of red, bearing the achenes on its exterior. About six natural species are recognized, though these are so variable as to make it possible that they all belong to one multiform species. F. vesca is common throughout the northern Old World and northward in North America. It includes the alpine strawberry, hantboy, and wood-strawberry (see below), was probably the first cultivated, and is the source of many artificial varieties, including the perpetuals. The Virginian scarlet strawberry, F. Virginiana, is common eastward in North America, and in the more robust variety Illinoensis extends perhaps to Oregon. The achenes, which in F. vesca are superficial, are in this species sunk in pits. It was the source of the famous Hovey's seedling, produced near Boston about 1840, and later of Wilson's Albany (or simply Wilson's), whose production marked an epoch in American strawberry-culture. In Chili and along the Pacific coast from San Francisco to Alaska grows the Chile strawberry, F. Chilensis, a low stout densely hairy plant with thick leaves and large flowers, which has been the source of valuable hybrids in France and England. The Indian strawberry, F. Indica, peculiar in its yellow petals and tasteless fruit, is only of ornamental value. The strawberry was not cultivated by the ancients; its culture in Europe began probably in the fifteenth or sixteenth century. It is now grown in great quantities in Europe.

and North America for its delicious subacid fruit, which is used fresh for dessert, and also canned or made into jam, and affords a syrup for flavoring drinks, ices, creams, etc. The varieties, which are mainly or wholly from the first three species above named, are numerous and constantly changing. See cuts under fragellum and Fragaria.

The strawberry grows underneath the nettle.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 1. 60.

Dr. Boteler said, of strawberries, "Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did." I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. Bohn), p. 158.

Alpine strawberry, a European form of Fragaria vesca, sometimes distinguished as F. collina. Ananas strawberry. Same as pine strawberry. Barren strawberry, in England, Potentilla Fragariastrum, resembling the strawberry in its trifoliate leaves and white flowers; in America, Waldsteinia fragarioides, having the leaves three-parted, but the flowers yellow. Neither has fleshy fruit.

Bog-strawberry, the marsh-fivefinger, Potentilla palustris. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.] Carolina strawberry, a misnomer of the pine strawberry, once thought to have come from Carolina. Chili strawberry. See def. and pine-strawberry. Crushed strawberry, a crimson-red color of considerably reduced luminosity and somewhat reduced chroma. A color disk of 38 parts pure red, 7 parts artificial ultramarine, 48 parts velvet-black, and 7 parts white shows a crushed strawberry.

Hautboy strawberry. See hautboy, 2. Pine-strawberry, a variety of the Chili strawberry (see def. above), so called from its pinnate leaves. Also Ananas strawberry. See Carolina strawberry. [Eng.] Scarlet strawberry, specifically, the Virginian strawberry. [Eng.] Strawberry-crown borer, a curculionid beetle, Tyloderma.

ma fragariae, which lays its eggs at the crown of the strawberry-plant in the United States, and whose larva often seriously damages the crop. — Strawberry false-worm. See strawberry saw-fly (below), and strawberry-worm. Strawberry leaf-roller, a tortricid moth, Phoxoptera fragariae, the larva of which rolls the leaves of the strawberry-plant in the United States; also, one of several other moths whose larva have this habit. See cut under leaf-roller. Strawberry-leaves, a dukedom: from the eight strawberry-leaves on a ducal coronet. Strawberry root-borer, a moth, Anarsia lineatella, whose larva burrows in the roots of this plant, and often does great damage. — Strawberry run. See run. Strawberry saw-fly, a small black saw-fly, Emphytus maculatus, whose larva is a strawberry-worm. See cut under Emphytus. Strawberry spinach. Same as strawberry-blite. Strawberry tongue, in med., a red papillated tongue, as seen in scarlatina. Wild strawberry, any native strawberry; also, sometimes, species of Potentilla, from their resemblance to the true strawberry. — Wood-strawberry, the typical form of Fragaria vesca. strawberry-mark (strá'ber-i-márk), n. A kind of birth-mark; a vascular nœvus, of reddish color and soft consistency, like a strawberry.

strawberry-moth (strá'ber-i-móth), n. Any moth whose larva injures the strawberry. (a) A strawberry root-borer. (b) A strawberry leaf-roller.

(c) One of three geometrids, Pyrophora truncata, Nematocampa filamentaria, and Angerone crocatoria, whose larvae feed on the foliage. (d) The smeared dagger, Acronycta obliqua.

strawberry-pear

(strá'ber-i-pär), n.

The fruit of a cactaceous plant, Cereus

triangularis, of the West Indies, etc., or the plant itself. This plant has three-angled branches which climb by rooting. The fruit is sub-acid, pleasant, and cooling, and is said to be the best-flavored afforded by any plant of the order.

strawberry-perch

(strá'ber-i-pèrch), n.

The grass-bass.

species. See Calycanthus.

strawberry-tomato (strá'ber-i-tô-má'tô), n.

The winter-cherry, Physalis Alkekengi. The berry, inclosed within an inflated calyx, resembles a cherry or a very small tomato in appearance. Also called husk- tomato.

strawberry-tree (strá'ber-i-tré), n. [< ME. strawberry-tree; < strawberry + tree.] 1t. The strawberry-plant. See the quotation under strawberry-wise. — 2. A handsome evergreen shrub or bushy tree, Arbutus Unedo, native in southern Europe. The scarlet granulated fruit at a distance resembles a strawberry, but is dry and lacking in flavor, though sometimes eaten. In Spain a sugar and a spirit are extracted from it. The flowers appear in autumn, when also the fruit, which ripens only the second season, is present. The name is extended to the other species of the genus. See cut under Arbutus, 3.

strawberry-vine (strá'ber-i-vin), n. See straw- berry.

strawberry-wise, n. [< ME. strawberry wyse, strawberry wyse, strobery wyse, streberwise, < AS. streawberie-wise, streaberie-wise, later streawberie-wise, strawberry-plant, < streawberie, straw-

A course of running water; a river, rivulet, or brook.

He stod bi the fodes strem.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), i. 2096.

He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers. Ps. lxxviii. 16.

As streams their channels deeper wear.

Burns, To Mary in Heaven.

2. A steady current in a river or in the sea; especially, the middle or most rapid part of a current or tide: as, to row against the stream; the Gulf Stream.

My boat sails freely, both with wind and stream.

Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 65.

Row, brothers, row! the stream runs fast,

The rapids are near, and the daylight's past!

Moore, Canadian Boat-Song.

3. A flow; a flowing; that which flows in or out, as a liquid or a fluid, air or light.

Bright was the day, and blew the firmament:

Phebus hath of gold his streames down ysent

To gladden every flour with his warmth.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 976.

Forth gusht a stream of gore blood thick.

Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 39.

A wandering stream of wind,

Breathed from the west, has caught the expanded sail.

Shelley, Alastor.

4. Anything issuing from a source and moving or flowing continuously: as, a stream of words; a stream of sand; a stream of people.

With never an end to the stream of passing feet.

Tennyson, Maud, xxvii. 1.

5. A continued course or current; the course or current of affairs or events; current; drift.

Such was the stream of those times that all men gave place unto it, which we cannot but impute partly to their own oversight. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 42.

For science, God is simply the stream of tendency by which all things fulfil the law of their being.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, i.

6. A rift: so called by English anglers. Norris.—Gulf Stream. See gulf.—Stream-function of the motion of an incompressible fluid in two dimensions, such a function that the total instantaneous flow across any curve, referred to the unit of time, is equal to the difference of the values of the stream-function at the extremities of the curve.—Stream of thought, the train of ideas which pass successively into present consciousness, regarded as analogous to a current flowing past a point on the bank.—The stream, the Gulf Stream.—Syn. 1 and 2. Stream, Current, Eddy. All rivers and brooks are streams, and have currents. An eddy is a counter-current, a current contrary to the main direction.

stream (strēm), v. [Cf. ME. streamen = D. stroomen = G. strömen = Icel. streyma = Sw. strömma = Dan. strömmen; from the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To move or run in a continuous current; flow continuously. See streaming, n., 2.

Within those banks, where rivers now

Stream, and perpetual draw their humid train.

Milton, P. L., vii. 306.

- Streams* the black blood. Pope, Odyssey, iii. 581.
2. To move or proceed continuously and uniformly, or in unbroken succession.
And to imperial Love, that sod most high,
Do my sighs stream. Shak., All's Well, ii. 3. 82.
- Streaming* files of wild ducks began to make their appearance high in the air. Irring, Sketch Book, p. 437.
3. To pour out a stream; also, to throw off a stream from the surface: as, streaming eyes; a streaming umbrella.
Then grateful Greece with streaming eyes would raise Historic marbles, to record his praise.
Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, i. 305.
Blasts that blow the poplar white,
And lash with storm the streaming pane.
Tennyson, in Memoriam, lxxii.
4. To move swiftly and continuously, as a ray of light; streak.
I looked up just in time to see a superb shooting star stream across the heavens. Nature, XXX, 455.
5. To stretch out in a line; hang or float at full length: as, streaming hair.
Standards and gonfalon 'twixt van and rear Stream in the air. Milton, P. L., v. 590.
Ribands streaming gay. Coeper, Task, iv. 541.
- II. trans. 1. To discharge in a stream; cause to flow; pour out.
Had I as many eyes as thou hast wounds,
Weeping as fast as they stream forth thy blood.
Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 201.
Calanus told Onesicritus of a golden world, where meale was as plentiful as dust, and fountains streamed milke, hony, wine, and oyle. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 454.
2. To cause to float out; wave.
Many a time hath banish'd Norfolk fought,
Streaming the ensign of the Christian cross Against black pagans, Turks, and Saracens.
Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 94.
- 3†. To stripe or ray. See streaming, a. [Rare.]
The herald's mantle is streamed with gold. Bacon.
4. (a) In mining, to wash, as the superficial detritus, especially that accumulated in the beds of rivers, for the purpose of separating any valuable ore which it may contain. See *placer*². The term stream, long in use in Cornwall, exclusively with reference to tin ores, seems hardly to have come into general use in any mining regions except those in which the ore of tin is mined. (b) In dyeing, to wash in running water, as silk, before putting in the dye. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 40.—To stream a buoy. See buoy.
- stream-anchor (strēm'ang'kōr), n. Naut., an anchor of a size intermediate between the bower-anchor and the kedgie. It is used for warping and like purposes. In the United States navy stream-anchors weigh from 400 to 1,500 pounds, and are about one-fourth the weight of bower-anchors.
- stream-cable (strēm'kā'bl), n. The cable or hawser of the stream-anchor.
- stream-clock (strēm'klok), n. [Tr. G. stromuhr.] A physiological instrument for determining the velocity of blood in a vessel.
- stream-current (strēm'kur'ēnt), n. See the quotation, and also drift-current.
A current whose onward movement is sustained by the vis a tergo of a drift-current is called a stream-current. Encyc. Brit., III. 19.
- streamer (strēm'mēr), n. [ME. stremmer, stremere; < stream + -er.] 1. That which streams out, or hangs or floats at full length: applied to anything long and narrow, as a ribbon.
All twinkling with the dewdrops' sheen,
The brier-rose fell in streamers green.
Scott, L. of the L., i. 11.
(a) A long narrow flag; a pennon extended or flowing in the wind: same as pennant, 1 (a).
His brave fleet
With silken streamers the young Phœbus fanning.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. Prol., i. 6.
(b) A stream or column of light shooting upward or outward, as in some forms of the aurora borealis.
He knew, by the streamers that shot so bright,
That spirits were riding the northern light.
Scott, L. of L. M., ii. 8.
(c) A long flowing strip of ribbon, or feather, or something similar, used in decoration, especially in dress.
A most airy sort of blue and silver turban, with a streamer of plumage on one side.
Charlotte Brontë, Villette, xx.
(d) A long-exserted feather which streams away from the rest of the plumage of some birds: a pennant or standard. See cuts under Semioptera and standard-bearer.
2. In mining, a person who washes for stream-tin. See streaming.—3. The geometrid moth Anticlea derivata: an English collectors' name.
- streamful (strēm'fūl), a. [< stream + -ful.] Full of streams or currents.
Like a ship despoiled of her sails,
Shov'd by the wind against the streamful tide.
Drayton, Legend of Pierce Gaveston, st. 105.

stream-gold (strēm'göld), n. See the quotation.

The gold of alluvial districts, called stream-gold or placer-gold, occurs, as well as alluvial tin, among the debris of the more ancient rocks. Ure, Dic., III. 298.

stream-ice (strēm'is), n. Pieces of drift or bay ice forming a ridge and following the line of current.

At 4 A. M. a seemingly close pack was seen to the eastward, but later it developed into stream-ice of small extent. A. W. Greeley, Arctic Service, p. 67.

streaminess (strēm'i-nes), n. The quality or state of being streamy.

I give the case of a star-group which is certainly not the most remarkable for streaminess.

R. A. Proctor, Universe of Stars (2d ed., 1878), p. 22.

streaming (strēm'ing), n. [Verbal n. of stream, v.] 1. In tin-mining, the washing of tin ore from the detritus with which it is associated. The now almost entirely exhausted deposits of detrital tin ore in Cornwall and Devon were called streams, because they occur chiefly in or near the bottoms of the valleys and adjacent to the present streams, or in the manner of deposits formed by streams, analogous to the channels of the Californian and the gutters of the Australian miners; the miners were themselves called streamers; the localities where streaming was carried on, stream-works; and the ore obtained, stream-tin.

2. In biol., the peculiar flowing motion of the particles of protoplasm in an amoeba or other rhizopod, by which the form of the animalecule changes or pseudopods are protruded; also, the similar circulation or rotation of the protoplasm of some plant-cells. See protoplasm, and rotation of protoplasm (under rotation).

streaming (strēm'ing), p. a. In her., issuing, as rays of light: as, rays streaming from the dexter chief.

streamless (strēm'les), a. [< stream + -less.] Not traversed by streams; unwatered. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 758.

streamlet (strēm'let), n. [< stream + -let.] A small stream; a rivulet; a rill.

Unnumber'd glittering streamlets play'd,
And hurried every where their waters sheen.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 3.

stream-line (strēm'lin), n. See *line*², and line of flow (under *flow*¹).—Stream-line surface. See surface.

streamling (strēm'ling), n. [< stream + *-ling*¹.] Same as streamlet.

A thousand Streamlings that n'er saw the Sun,
With tribute silver to his service run.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Capitaines.

stream-tin (strēm'tin), n. In mining, tin ore, or oxid of tin, obtained in streaming (which see).

stream-wheel (strēm'hwēl), n. An undershot wheel, or current-wheel.

stream-works (strēm'wērks), n. sing. and pl. In mining, a locality where the detrital deposits are washed in order to procure the valuable metal or ore which they may contain; alluvial washings, or surface mining. The words stream-works and stream (v. t.) are rarely, if ever, used except with reference to the separation of tin ore from detrital deposits.

streamwort (strēm'wért), n. A plant of Lindley's order Haloragacæ. [Rare.]

streamy (strēm'i), a. [Early mod. E. also streamy; < stream + -y.] 1. Abounding in streams. (a) Full of running water or of springs.

(However streamy), now adust and dry, Deny'd the Goddess Water.
Prior, First Hymn of Callimachus.

(b) Full of or emitting streaming rays of light.

In streamy sparkles, kindling all the skies,
From pole to pole the trail of glory flies.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 321.

2. Having the form of a beam or stream of light.

street, n. An obsolete form of street.

streetfield's operation. See operation.

streberry, n. An obsolete form of strawberry.

Strebla (streb'lā), n. [NL. (Wiedemann, 1824), < Gr. σπρεβλός, twisted, crooked, < σπρέειν, twist.] A peculiar genus of pupiparous dipterous insects, of the family Nycteribiidae, including certain so-called bat-lice or bat-ticks. S. vespertilionis is a common bat-parasite occurring in South America and the West Indies.

streblosis (streb'lō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπρεβλός, twisted; see Strebla.] The angle through which it is necessary to rotate an element of a figure to bring it into coincidence with the corresponding element of a given conformable figure.

Streblius (streb'lus), n. [NL. (Loureiro, 1790), so called in allusion to its branches, which form a dense mass of rigid straggling twigs; < Gr. σπρεβλός, twisted; see Strebla.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Urticacæ and tribe Moreæ, type of the subtribe Strebleæ. It is characterized by usually dioecious flowers, the male in clustered two-bracted heads, the female solitary on the peduncle, the perianth consisting of four widely overlapping segments which closely invest the one-celled ovary. As in most of the subtribe, its cotyledons are very unequal, and the larger, which is very fleshy, incloses the smaller. The only species, S. asper (Trophis aspera), is the tonkoi or paper-tree of the Siamese, who prepare several kinds of paper from its bark, including a heavy and a thin white paper, and a black paper for use like a slate, much employed in the native law-courts. It is a small tree, reaching about thirty feet in height, bearing dark-green oval coriaceous two-ranked leaves, and occurring from China and Manila to the Andaman Islands.

strecchet, v. An old spelling of stretch.

street, n. A Middle English form of strawl.

Gael. sraid = NGr. στράτα, < LL. strata, a street, road, highway, orig. via strata, a paved way, < L. strata, fem. of stratus, pp. of sternere, strew, scatter, spread, cover, pave; see stratum. Street is one of the very few words regarded as received in England from the Roman invaders, others being chester (Chester), port, wall, and -coln in Lincoln. Cf. *stray*¹, *stray*².] 1†. A paved road; a highway.

This grand-child, great as he [Mulmutius], those four proud Streets begun
That each way cross this Isle, and bounds did them allow.
Drayton, Polyolbion, viii. 74.
There were at that time [fifth year after the Conquest] in England four great roads, . . . of which two ran lengthways through the island, and two crossed it, . . . Watlinge-strete, Fosse, Hikenilde-strete, and Erming-strete. Guest, Origines Celtice, II. 218.

2. A public way or road, whether paved or unpaved, in a village, town, or city, ordinarily including a sidewalk or sidewalks and a roadway, and having houses or town lots on one or both sides; a main way, in distinction from a lane or alley: as, a fashionable street; a street of shops. Abbreviated St., st. Compare road, 3. Strictly, the word excludes the houses, which are on the street; but in a very common use it includes the land and houses, which are then in the street: as, a house in High Street. In law, street sometimes includes as much of the surface, and as much of the space above and of the soil or depth beneath, as may be needed for the ordinary works which the local authorities may decide to execute on or in a street, including sidewalks.

Up Fish Street! down Saint Magnus' Corner!
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 8. 1.

3. The way for vehicles, between the curbs, as distinguished from the sidewalks: as, to walk in the street.—4. Hence, a path or passageway inclosed between continuous lines of objects; a track; a lane.
It seemed to be, as it were, a continued street of shippes. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 435.
I was ushered through an actual street of servitors. Disraeli, Vivian Grey, iii. 8.

5†. A path; a way.
Than makest thou his pees with his sovereyn,
And bringest him out of the croked streete.
Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 70.

While I ran by the most secret streets,
Eschewing still the common haunted track.
Surrey, Æneid, ii. 975.

6. The inhabitants of a street collectively. [Colloq.]

All the whole street will hate us, and the world
Point me out cruel. Middleton, Chaste Maid, v. 2.

Grub Street. See Grub-street.—Lombard Street. See *Lombard*², 1.—Queer Street. See *queer*¹.—Street Arab. See Arab, 2.—Street broker.—The street, a street (as Wall Street in New York) or locality where merchants or stock-brokers congregate for business; the commercial exchange: as, it is rumored on the street.

Common places whither marchantes resort as to the burse or streete. Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books [on America, ed. Arber, p. 186]).

To have the key of the street. See *key*¹. To spin street-yarn. See spin.—Syn. 2. Road, etc. See way.

streetage (strēt'tāj), n. [< street + -age.] A charge made for the use of a street. [Rare.]

street-car (strēt'kär), n. A passenger-car for local or city travel, drawn on the surface of the public streets by horses, by a locomotive engine, or by an endless cable, or propelled by electricity. [U. S.]

The street-car is part of the foreground, changing the character of the surrounding passengers.

H. Jones, Jr., The Bostonians, XXIV.

street-door (strēt-dōr), n. The door of a house or other building which opens upon a street.

When a street is a few doors off . . . to see a brother-farmhouse door, to be changed, have the street door open.

Scott, Advice to Servants (Footman).

streeted (strē'tod), a. Provided with streets.

There are few places this side the Alps better built, and so well streeted as this (Antwerp).

Howell, Letters, I. i. 12.

strength (streng'th), n. [< ME. strength, strength, strenght, also strenthe, strenthe, <

AS. strengthu (= OHG. strenghida), strength, < strange, strong; see strong.] Cf. length, < long.]

1. The property of being strong; force; power. Specifically—(a) In animals, that attribute of an animal body by which it is enabled to move itself or other bodies. The strength of animals is the muscular force or energy which they are capable of exerting. See horse-power.

Vixens also, with angarely monkey Of tulkis (knights) of Traci, for men of strenkyth.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), 1. 6894.

The external indications of strength are the abundance and firmness of the muscular fibres.

Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, vi. 9. [Used in plural with same sense as singular.]

Alle his [Samson's] strenghes in his heres were.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale, I. 68.]

(b) In inanimate things, the property by which they sustain the application of force without breaking or yielding; as, the strength of a bone; the strength of a beam; the strength of a wall; the strength of a rope.

Our castle's strength Will laugh a siege to scorn.

Shak., Macbeth, v. 5. 2.

The city is of no greates strength, having a trifling wall about it.

Evelyn, Diary, May 21, 1645.

Hence—2. Power or vigor of any kind; ability; capacity for work or effective action, whether physical, intellectual, or moral: as, strength of grasp or stroke; strength of mind, memory, or judgment; strength of feeling (that is, not intensity but effectiveness of emotion).

If, rather than to marry County Paris, Thou hast the strength of will to slay thyself.

Shak., R. and J., iv. 1. 72.

The belief He has of his own great and catholic strengths In arguing and discourse.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 2.

In the world of morals, as in the world of physics, strength is nearly allied to hardness.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 354.

3. One who or that which is regarded as an embodiment of force or strength; that on which confidence or reliance is firmly set; stay; support; security.

God is our refuge and strength. Ps. xli. 1.

Thy counsel, in this uttermost distress, My only strength and stay. Milton, P. L., x. 921.

Hitherto, Davenant observes, in taxing the people we had gone chiefly on land and trade, which is about one-third of the strength of England.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 56.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, vii.

10. In colors, the relative property possessed by a pigment of imparting a color to and modifying the shade of any other pigment to which it is added. Thus, one pound of lampblack added to 100 pounds of white lead produces a dark-gray shade, but one pound of ivory-black added in the same way would have little effect on the white.

11. In the fine arts, boldness of conception or treatment.

Carracci's strength, Correggio's softer line.

Pope, Epistle to Jervas, 1. 37.

12. In soap-making. See the quotation.

A peculiar phenomenon may be remarked in the cooling [of a little of the soap placed on a glass plate], which affords a good criterion of the quality of the soap. When there is formed around the little patch an opaque zone, a fraction of an inch broad, this is supposed to indicate complete saponification, and is called the strength; when it is absent, the soap is said to want its strength. When this zone soon vanishes after being distinctly seen, the soap is said to have false strength. Ure, Dict., III. 852.

On the strength (milit. and naval), on the muster-rolls. [Colloq.]

The colonel had put the widow woman on the strength; she was no longer an unrecognized waif, but had her regimental position.

Arch. Forbes, in Eng. Illust. Mag., VI. 525.

On or upon the strength of, in reliance upon the value of; on the faith of: as, to do something on the strength of another's promise.

My father set out upon the strength of these two following axioms. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ii. 19.

Proof strength. See proof, a.—Strength of a current, in elect., the quantity of electricity which passes in a unit of time; the measure of electrical energy. See Ohm's law, under law.—Strength of materials. See material.—Strength of pole. See pole.—Strength of the source. See the quotation.

The time rate of supply of liquid through the source is called the strength of the source.

Minchin, Uniplanar Kinematics, vi.

To measure strength. See measure. = Syn. 1. Force, etc. See power.

strength (streng'th), v. t. [< ME. strengthen, strenthen; < strength, n.] To strengthen.

Take this for a general rule, that every counsel that is affirmed or strengthened so strongly that it may not be changed for no condition that may bide—I say that thilke counsel is wicked.

Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus (Harleian MS.).

The helpe of Gods grace in that tribulation to strengthen him.

Sir T. More, Cumfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 16.

His armes and leggyss [were] well lengthed and strengthened.

Fabian, Chron., clvi.

strengthen (streng'thn), v. [< strength + -en.] I. trans. To make strong or stronger; add strength to, either physical, legal, or moral; confirm; establish: as, to strengthen a limb; to strengthen an obligation; to strengthen a claim; to strengthen authority.

Charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him.

Deut. iii. 28.

Let noble Warwick, Cobham, and the rest . . . With powerful policy strengthen themselves.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 2. 58.

For the more strengthening the Acts of this Parliament, the King purchased the Pope's Bulls, containing grievous Censures and Curses to them that should break them.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 149.

Strengthening plaster. See plaster. = Syn. To invigorate, fortify, brace, nerve, steel, corroborate, support, heighten.

II. intrans. To grow strong or stronger.

The young disease, that must subdue at length, Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength.

Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 136.

strengthen (streng'thn), n. [Formerly also strengthen; < strengthen + -er.] One who or that which makes strong or stronger; one who or that which increases strength, physical or moral.

Whose plays are strengtheners of virtue.

Mary Lamb, Tales from Shakspeare, Pref.

strengthful (streng'thful), a. [< strength + -ful.] Abounding in strength; strong. Mars-ton.

strengthfulness (streng'thful-nes), n. The state or quality of being strengthful or strong; fullness of strength.

strengthening (streng'thing), n. [Verbal n. of strengthen, v.] A strengthening. Palsgrave. (Hallivell.)

strengthless (streng'thles), a. [< strength + -less.] Destitute of strength, in any sense of the word. Shak.; Boyle.

strengthen (streng'thner), n. Same as strengthen.

strengthy (streng'thi), a. [Early mod. E. also strenthie; < strength + -y. Cf. lengthy.] Having strength; strong.

The simple and strenthie defence of one just caus.

J. Tyrie, Refutation, Pref. 2. (Jamieson.)

strenkle (streng'kl), v. t. An obsolete or Scotch form of strenkle.

strenkle (streng'kl), n. [< ME. strenkyll; < strenkle, v. Cf. sprinkle, n.] A sprinkler. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Strenkyll to cast holy water, vimpilon.

Palsgrave. (Hallivell.)

strenth, n. An obsolete form of strength.

strenuity (stre-nū'i-ti), n. [< L. strenuita(t)-s, nimbleness, friskiness, < strenuus, quick, active, vigorous: see strenuous.] Strenuousness.

About in the see
No Prince was of better strenuities.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 206.

strenuosity (stren-ū-ōs'i-ti), n. [< strenuus + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being strenuous; strenuousness.—2. A strained effect, or a straining for effect, as in a literary composition.

Strenuosity in style is not quite the same thing as strength.
The Academy, Jan. 30, 1886, p. 73.

strenuous (stren-ū-us), a. [< L. strenuus, quick, active, brisk, vigorous; cf. Gr. στερεός, firm, hard, σπρῆγς, strong.] 1. Strong; vigorous; active; pushing.

Him whose strenuous tongue
Can burst Joy's grape against his palate line.
Keats, Melancholy.

2. Eagerly pressing or urgent; energetic; zealous; ardent; bold; earnest; valiant; intrepid.

To strenuous minds there is an inquietude in overquietness.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i, 33.

This scheme encountered strenuous opposition in the council.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

3. Necessitating vigor or energy; accompanied by labor or exertion.

What more oft, in nations grown corrupt, . . .
Than to love bondage more than liberty,
Bondage with ease than strenuous liberty?
Milton, S. A., i, 271.

Worldlings revelling in the fields
Of strenuous idleness.
Wordsworth, Memory.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Energetic, resolute.

strenuously (stren-ū-us-li), adv. In a strenuous manner; with eager and pressing zeal; ardently; boldly; vigorously; actively.

strenuousness (stren-ū-us-nes), n. The state or character of being strenuous; eagerness; earnestness; active zeal.

strepit, v. An old spelling of strepit.

strepent (strep'ent), a. [< L. strepen(t)-s, ppr. of strepere, make a noise, rumble, murmur.] Noisy; loud. [Rare.]

Peace to the strepent horn!
Shenstone, Rural Elegance.

Strepera (strep'e-rā), n. [NL. (Lesson, 1831), < L. strepera, make a noise.] An Australian genus of corvine passerine birds, typical of the subfamily Streperinae, having long wings and naked nostrils. Also called Coronica (Gould, 1837). There are 7 species, commonly called crow-shrikes, of a black, blackish brown, or gray color, more or less varied with white or rufous. The type is Corvus graculinus of White, the noisy roller of Latham, Coracias or Gracula or Barila strepera of various authors, now Strepera graculina. It is glossy-black, with the base of the tail and an alar speculum white, the iris yellow. The length is 18½ inches. S. crissalis, arguta, intermedia, canadensis (or anaphonensis; see spicaker), melanoptera, and fuliginosa are the other species.

Crow-shrike Strepera graculina

streperine (strep'e-rin), a. [< Strepera + -ine.]

Of or pertaining to birds of the genus Strepera.

streperous (strep'e-rus), a. [< L. strepere, make a noise, rumble, murmur, + -ous. Cf. obstreperous.] Noisy; loud; boisterous. [Rare.]

In a streperous eruption it [the bay or laurel] riseth against fire.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii, 6.

strepotome (stref'ō-tōm), n. [< Gr. στρέπω, twist, turn, + -τομή, < τέμνω, ταμῖν, cut.] A corkscrew-like needle used in an operation for the radical cure of inguinal hernia.

Streptopores (strep-i-tō-réz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of strepitor*, < L. strepere, make a noise: see strepent.] A group of insectorial birds, established by Blyth in 1849 for those Cuvierian Passerinae which are non-passerine, and primarily divided into Synodactyli, Zygodactyli, and Heterodactyli. See these words.

strepitoso (strep-i-tō-sō), adv. [It., < strepito, noise, < L. strepitus, noise: see strepitulos.] In music, in an impetuous, boisterous, noisy manner.

strepitously (strep'i-tus), a. [< L. strepitus, noise, < strepere, make a noise: see strepent.] Noisy.

strepsicere (strep'si-sēr), n. [< strepsiceros.]

An antelope with twisted horns; a strepsicerous.

Strepsiceros (strep-sis'e-rōs), n. [NL., < L. strepsiceros, < Gr. στρεψικέρως, an animal with twisted horns, called by the Africans addax.] 1. Some antelope with twisted horns, as the koodoo; originally, perhaps, the addax.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Hamilton Smith, 1827).] A genus of antelopes with twisted or spiral horns. The only species now left in the genus is S. kudu, the koodoo. See cut under koodoo.

Strepsilas (strep'si-las), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811), < Gr. στρέψιλος, a turning round, < στρέφω (aor. στρέψαι), twist, turn, + λᾶς, λαός, a stone.] The typical genus of a subfamily Strepsilainæ; the turnstones. The bill is short, constricted at the base, tapering to a sharp point, with ascending gonyes longer than the mandibular rami, short and broad nasal fosse, and short shallow grooves in the under mandible. The legs are short and stout, with the tarsus scutellate in front and reticulate on the sides and back, and four toes, cleft to the base. There are 2 species—S. interpres, the common turnstone, and S. melanoleucus of the North Pacific, the black-headed turnstone, perhaps only a variety of the other. The genus was also called Cinclus, Arenaria, and Morinella. See cuts under Pressirostres and turnstone.

strepsipter (strep-sip'tēr), n. [< NL. Strepsiptera.] A member of the Strepsiptera.

Strepsiptera (strep-sip'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of strepsipterus*: see strepsipterous.]

1. An order of insects, named by Kirby in 1833 from the twisted wings, synonymous with Rhipiptera of Latreille, and corresponding to the family Stylopidæ. The fore wings are mere twisted filaments or pseudelytra; the hind wings are expansive and fan-shaped; the females are wingless. The strepsipterous are parasitic on hymenopterous insects, especially bees and wasps. They are now regarded as anomalous Coleoptera degraded by parasitism. See cut under Stylops. 2. In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a family of neuropterous insects, forming with Phryganida the suborder Trichoptera.

strepsipteral (strep-sip'te-rāl), a. [< strepsipterous + -al.] Same as strepsipterous.

strepsipteran (strep-sip'te-ran), n. and a. [< NL. Strepsiptera + -an.] I. n. A strepsipter. II. a. Same as strepsipterous.

strepsipterous (strep-sip'te-rus), a. [*< NL. strepsipterus, < Gr. στρέψω (aor. στρέψαι), twist, turn, + πτερόν, a wing.] Having twisted front wings, as a stylops; of or pertaining to the Strepsiptera; rhipipterous. Also strepsipteran, strepsipteral. See cut under Stylops.

strepsirrhinal, strepsirrhine (strep-si-rī-nāl), a. [< strepsirrhine + -al.] Same as strepsirrhine.

strepsirrhine, strepsirrhine (strep'si-rin), a. and n. [*< NL. strepsirrhinus, < Gr. στρέψω (aor. στρέψαι), turn, twist, + ῥίς (ῥῖν), nose.] I. a. Having twisted or curved nostrils, as a lemur; of or pertaining to the Strepsirrhini; neither catarrhine nor platyrrhine, as a primate. Also strepsirrhine.

II. n. Any lemur or prosimian; a member of the Strepsirrhini.

Strepsirrhini, Strepsirhini (strep-si-rī-ni), n. pl. [NL. (Geoffroy): see strepsirrhine.] The lemuroid mammals, or lemurs: so called from the twisted nostrils, in distinction from Catarrhini and Platyrrhini. In these animals the nostrils are at the corners of the snout, and somewhat comma-shaped, as is usual in mammals, instead of having the more human character of those of the higher Primates. The term is exactly synonymous with Prosimia or Lemuroidea, excepting that in early usages of all three of these names of lemurs the so-called flying-lemurs (Galeopithecidae) were wrongly included, these being insectivorous and not primate mammals, now always excluded from the strepsirrhines. Also Strepsirrhina, Strepsirrhina, and Strepsirrhina.

Streptanthus (strep-tan'thus), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1825), so called from the greatly twisted claws of the petals; < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted (< στρέφω, twist, turn), + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Cruciferae and tribe Arabideæ, distinguished from the type-genus Arabis by a calyx commonly of large size, longer and sometimes connate stamens, and petals usually borne on a twisted claw. There are about 16 species, natives of North America, and chiefly of the western United States. They are smooth annuals or perennials, with entire or lyrate leaves and commonly bractless flowers, which are purple or sometimes white or yellow, and in some species pendulous. S. obtusifolius, a pink-flowered species, has been called Arkansas cabbage.

streptobacteria (strep'tō-bak-tē-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + NL. bacteria.] A supposed bacterium, consisting of a chain of short rod-formed bacteria linked together. Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i, 185.

Streptocarpus (strep-tō-kār'pus), n. [NL. (Lindley, 1828), so called from the spirally twisted fruit; < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Gesneraceæ, tribe Cyrtandreeæ, and subtribe Didymocarpeæ. It is characterized by flowers with an elongated corolla-tube which is much enlarged above, and contains two perfect stamens and a linear ovary imperfectly four-celled by the protrusion of lobed placentae densely covered on their margins with ovules, and becoming a spirally twisted capsule which is linear and terete and splits into valves coherent at the base and apex. There are about 19 species, natives of South Africa and of Madagascar. They are woolly or downy herbs, chiefly with spreading radical leaves or with a single leaf (a persistent cotyledon), sometimes with a stem bearing opposite leaves. The handsome flowers are mostly pale purple or blue; they form a many-flowered cyme, or are borne few or singly upon their peduncle. S. Dumii, a remarkable species from the Transvaal mountains, is cultivated for its peculiar solitary grayish-green leaf, prostrate on the ground and over 3 feet long, with thick fleshy veins and clothed beneath with close reddish down, and for its bright-red tubular decurved flowers, of which there are sometimes over one hundred on a scape at once. Several other species are in cultivation under glass, especially S. Watsoni, a hybrid with several large leaves and rich crimson flowers, and S. Rezii, with blue flowers. They are known as Cape primrose.

streptococchemia, streptococchæmia (strep'tō-kō-kē-mi-ā), n. [NL., < streptococci + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] The presence of streptococci in the blood.

streptococci (strep-tō-kok'si), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + κόκκος, a berry.] A chain of micrococci linked together, occurring in some specific diseases. Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i, 185.

Streptoneura (strep-tō-nū-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of streptoneurus: see streptoneurous.] A branch of anisopleurous Gastropoda, in which the long loop of visceral nerves embracing the intestine is caught and twisted into a figure-of-8 by the torsion which the animal undergoes in its development. The Streptoneura are divided into two orders, Zygobranchia and Azygobranchia. They include all the anisopleurous gastropods except the opisthobranchs and pulmonifers. The nearest synonym is Prosobranchiata.

streptoneural (strep-tō-nū-rāl), a. [< streptoneurous + -al.] Same as streptoneurous.

streptoneurous (strep-tō-nū-rus), a. [*< NL. streptoneurus, < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + νῆρον, a nerve.] Having twisted (visceral) nerves; specifically, pertaining to the Streptoneura, or having their characters.

Streptopus (strep'tō-pus), n. [NL. (F. A. Michaux, 1803), so called from the abruptly bent flower-stalk; < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + πούς = E. foot.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Liliaceæ and tribe Polygonateæ. It is characterized by nodding solitary or twin axillary flowers, divided into six more or less spreading segments, with a filiform or columnar style which is three-cleft at the apex. There are 4 species, natives of Europe, North America, and temperate parts of Asia. They are rather delicate plants, from a short and densely fiber-bearing or a creeping root-stock, with a simple or sparingly branched stem, bearing numerous ovate or lanceolate alternate sessile or clasping leaves. The small rose-colored or whitish flowers hang upon slender recurved or reflexed peduncles, followed by small roundish berries with numerous pale oblong or curving striate seeds. They are known by the name twisted-stalk, translating the genus name. S. amplexifolius is found in Europe, and together with S. roseus, in northern North America, and southward in the mountains.

streptospondyliian (strep'tō-spon-dil'i-an), a. Same as streptospondylious.

streptospondylous (strep-tō-spon'di-lus), a. [*< NL. streptospondylus, < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted + σπονδυλός, σπονδυλός, a vertebra.] Having the character of the vertebral articulations reversed, or supposed to be so, as in the genus Streptospondylus.

Streptospondylus (strep-tō-spon'di-lus), n. [NL. (Meyer): see streptospondylous.] A genus of fossil crocodiles, founded on remains represented by vertebrae of the Wealden and Oolitic formations. It was originally placed among the opisthocellic Crocodylia, subsequently among the amphiocellic. The genus agrees with such forms as Teleosaurus, which have the external nares terminal, and is placed by Huxley in the family Teleosauridae.

streptostylic (strep-tō-stil'ik), a. [< NL. streptostylicus, < Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + στυλή, a pillar.] Having the quadrate bone freely articulated with the skull, as in ophidian and saurian reptiles; not monimostylic; of or pertaining to the Streptostylica.

Streptostylica (strep-tō-stil'ik-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of streptostylicus: see streptostylic.] Streptostylic reptiles, a prime division of ordinary reptiles (as snakes and lizards), having an articulated quadrate bone and a pair of extracloacal copulatory organs: opposed to Monimostylica. They were divided into Ophi-

Streptostylia (including Amphibrama). Stan- ley, 1890.

Streptothrix (strep'tō-thrīks), n. [NL. (F.) Streptothrix, twisted, + thrīx, the hair.]
A fungus standing probably intermediate between the bacteria and the fungi proper. It consists of very minute colorless, branching filaments, growing in gelatinous masses like the mycelium of fungi.
S. trachea was found by Cohn in the concretions of the lacrimal canals of the eye.

stress¹ (stres), v. t. [OF. estrecier, estressier, estrechier, estroyssier, etc., straiten, contract, < ML. as if strachare*, < L. stractus, pp. of stringere, draw together, compress: see stringent, *strain*¹, strict. Cf. distress.] 1. To straiten; constrain; press; urge; hamper. [Rare.]

If the magistrate be so stressed that he cannot protect those that are pious and peaceable, the Lord help.

Watchhouse, Apol. for Learning, p. 155. (Latham.)

2. In mech., to subject to a stress.

The theory of elastic solids . . . shows that when a solid is stressed the state of stress is completely determined when the amount and direction of the three principal stresses are known. Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., § 832.

3. To lay the stress, emphasis, or accent on; emphasize.

If he had eased his heart in stressing the first syllable, it was only temporary relief.

G. Meredith, The Egoist, xviii.

stress¹ (stres), n. [*< stress*¹, v.] 1. Constraining, urging, or impelling force; constraining power or influence; pressure; urgency; violence.

By stress of weather driven,
At last they landed. Dryden, Æneid, i. 503.

2. In mech., an elastic force, whether in equilibrium with an external force or not; the force called into play by a strain. This word was introduced into mechanics by Rankine in 1855. In the following year Sir William Thomson used the word as synonymous with pressure or an external force balanced by elastic forces. The terminology has been further confused by the use of Rankine's word strain, by Thomson and others, as a synonym for deformation. The words stress and strain are needed in the senses originally given to them by Rankine; while they both have familiar equivalents to which they have been wrested. At present, some writers use them in one way and some in the other.

In this paper the word strain will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word stress will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it.

Rankine, Axes of Elasticity, § 2.

A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. . . . It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word stress, as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action.

Thomson, Phil. Trans., (LXVI.) 487.

3. Stretch; strain; effort.

Though the faculties of the mind are improved by exercise, yet they must not be put to a stress beyond their strength.

Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, xxviii.

4. Weight; importance; special force or significance; emphasis.

Consider how great a stress he laid upon this duty, . . . and how earnestly he recommended it. Bp. Atterbury.

This, on which the great stress of the business depends.

Locke, (Johnson.)

So rare the sweep, so nice the art,
That lays no stress on any part.

Lovell, Appledore.

5. The relative loudness with which certain syllables or parts of syllables are pronounced; emphasis in utterance; accent; ictus. In elocution, initial, opening, or radical stress is stress or emphasis at the beginning; medial or median stress is that in the middle; and close, final, or vanishing stress is stress at the end of a vowel-sound. The union of initial and final is compound stress, that of all three stresses is thorough stress.

Anticlastic stress. See anticlastic.—Axis of a stress. one of three mutually perpendicular lines meeting at any point of a body in which a given stress tends to produce only elongation or contraction, without any tangential action. Center of stress. See center.—Close stress. See close.—Composition of stresses. See composition of displacement, under composition.—Compound stress. See compound.—Concurrent stress and strain. See concurrent.—Final stress. See def. 5.—Homogeneous stress, in mech., a stress which affects alike all similar and similarly turned portions of matter within the boundary within which the stress is said to be homogeneous.

Initial stress. See def. 5.—Lateral stress. See lateral.—Medial, median stress. See def. 5.—Normal stress, a stress such that its tendency to change the relative positions of two parts of a solid always acts along the normal to the surface separating those parts.

Orthogonal stress. See orthogonal.—Orthogonal stress, in mech., a stress which neither increases nor diminishes the work of producing that strain. (2) See def. 5.—Orthogonal stress, a stress which neither increases nor diminishes the work of producing that strain. (2) See def. 5.

orthogonal to a strain perfectly concurrent with the other stress.—Perfectly concurrent stress. (a) Relatively to another stress, a stress equal to that other multiplied by a real number. (b) Relatively to an infinitesimal homogeneous strain, a stress such that, if the strain be so compounded with a rotation as to produce a pure strain, the motions of the particles upon the surface of a sphere relatively to its center represent in magnitude and direction the components of the stress.—Principal tension of a stress, a component of the stress along one of its axes.—Radical stress. See def. 5.—Shearing stress, a stress tending to produce a shear.—Storm and stress. See storm.—Synclastic stress, a stress upon a plate tending to give it a positive curvature.—Tangential stress, a stress such that its tendency to change the relative positions of two parts of a solid always acts along the tangents to the surface separating those parts. Such a stress consists of three shearing stresses having orthogonal axes.—The principal axes of stress. See axis.—Thorough stress. See def. 5.—Type of a stress. See type.—Vanishing stress, an increasing loudness toward the end of a vowel-sound, producing the effect of a jerk.

See def. 5.—Syn. 5. Accent, etc. See emphasis.

stress² (stres), n. [*< stress*¹, v.] In part an aphetic form of distress, q. v. 1. Distress; difficulty; extremity; pinch. [Obsolete or archaic.]

And help the pure that ar in stres
Opprest and hereit mercyles.

Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), i. 469.

The agony and stress
Of pitying love. Whittier, The Two Rabbits.

2. In law: (a) The act of distraining; distress. (b) A former mode of taking up indictments for circuit courts.

stress-diagram (stres'di'g-a-gram), n. See diagram.

stressless (stres'les), a. [*< stress*¹ + -less.] Without stress; specifically, unaccented. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 788.

stretcher (strech'ér), n. [< stretch + -er.] 1. One who or that which stretches or expands. Specifically—(a) A tool for stretching the fingers of leather gloves, that they may be put on more easily. (b) In shoemaking, same as shoe-stretcher. (c) A frame, composed of four pieces of wood, upon which painters' canvas is drawn tight. By driving small wedges in at the angles the tension is increased. (d) One of the rods in an umbrella attached at one end to one of the ribs, and at the other to the tube sliding upon the handle. (e) In a vehicle, a jointed rod which when extended expands the carriage-bows, and thus spreads the hood or cover. (f) A short piece of wood placed in the clue of a hammock to extend it.

2. In masonry, a brick or stone laid horizontally with its length in the direction of the face of the wall, as distinguished from a header, which is laid lengthwise across the thickness of the wall, so that its small head or end is seen in the external face of the wall. See cut under inboard.—3. One of the cylindrical rails between the legs of a chair; a round. E. H. Knight.—4. In cabinet-making, a low shelf serving as a brace or stay to the legs of a table, and roomy enough to hold a vase, a basket of flowers, or other ornament.—5. In carp., a tie-timber in a frame.—6. Naut., a narrow piece of plank placed across a boat for the rowers to set their feet against; also, a cross-piece placed between a boat's sides to keep them apart when the boat is hoisted up and gripped.—7. A light, simple litter, without inclosure or top, upon which a dead body or a wounded person can be carried: so called because generally composed of canvas stretched on a frame, or because the body is stretched out upon it. Such frames, covered with canvas, are often used as beds, as in camping.—8. A flat board on which corpses are stretched or laid out preparatory to confining.—9. In angling: (a) The leader at the extreme end of the line. (b) The tail-fly; the fly that is fastened to the east called the stretcher; a stretcher-fly. See tail-fly (under *fly*²) and whip.—10. A statement which overstates the truth; a lie. [Colloq.]—11. In carriage-building, same as strainer, 4.

stretcher-bond (strech'ér-bond), n. A method of building in which bricks or stones are laid lengthwise in contiguous courses, the joints of one coming at half length of the bricks or stones in the other. See cuts under bond.

stretcher-fly (strech'ér-flí), n. The fly on the stretcher of a casting-line, at the extreme end.

stretcher-mule (strech'ér-mül), n. In cotton-manuf., a mule which stretches and twists fine rovings, advancing them a stage toward finishing. E. H. Knight.

stretch-halter (strech'hál'tér), n. [*< stretch, v., + obj. halter*¹.] One who ought to be hanged; a scoundrel. Also crack-rope, wag-halter, etc.

'Sfoot, look here, look here, I know this is the shop, by that same stretch-halter.
Heywood, If you know not me (Works, ed. 1874), I. 283.

stretching-frame (strech'ing-frám), n. 1. In cotton-manuf., a machine for stretching rovings previous to spinning them into yarn.—2. A frame on which starched fabrics are stretched to dry. It is sometimes arranged so that the direction of the tension can be changed in order to give the fabric a soft and elastic finish.

stretching-iron (strech'ing-í'érn), n. In leather-manuf.: (a) A carriers' tool for stretching curried leather, smoothing the surface, removing rough places, and raising the bloom. It consists of a flat piece of metal or stone set in a handle. (b) Same as softening-iron.

stretching-machine (strech'ing-má-shén'), n. Any machine by which some material is stretched; specifically, a machine in which cotton goods and other textile fabrics are stretched, to lay all their warp- and woof-yarns truly parallel.

stretching-piece (strech'ing-pēs), n. See *strut*².

stretchy (strech'í), a. [*< stretch + -y*¹.] 1. Liable to stretch unduly.

A workman with a true eye can often counteract stretchy stock.
Harper's Mag., LXX, 282.

2. Inclined to stretch one's self: a consequence of fatigue or sleepiness. [Colloq. in both uses.]

But in the night the pup would get stretchy and brace his feet against the old man's back and shove, grunting complacently the while. S. L. Clemens, Roughing it, xxvii.

stretta (stret'tā), n.; pl. strette (-te). [It., fem. of stretto, drawn tight: see *strait*¹, strict.] Same as stretto.

stretto (stret'tō), n.; pl. stretti (-ti). [It., < L. strictus, drawn tight: see *strait*¹, strict.] In music: (a) In a fugue, that division in which the entrances of the answer are almost immediately after those of the subject, so that the two overlap, producing a rapidly cumulative effect. The stretto properly follows the "working out." When a stretto is constructed in strict canon, it is sometimes called a stretto maestrale or magistrale. (b) In dramatic music, a quickening of the tempo at the end of a movement for the sake of climax.

strew (strō or strō), v.; pret. strewed, pp. strewed or strewn, ppr. strewn. [Also archaically strow, formerly or dial. also straw; < ME. strewen, strawen, strewen, < AS. stredwian, also stredwian, strewian* (Somner) = OS. strewian, strowian = OFries. strewa = D. strooien = OHG. strewen, MHG. strōwen, strouwen, G. streuen = Icel. strá = *Sw. Worcestershire Wills of 16th and 17th Cent., [quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., X. 369.]

3. A handful or bunch of flax, jute, or other fiber, heckled and sorted, or ready to be heckled.

The heckler stakes a handful or strick of rough flax.
Encyc. Brit., XIV. 665.

stricken (stri'k'n), p. a. [Pp. of strike, v.] 1. Struck; smitten: as, the stricken deer.—2. Advanced; far gone.

I chanced to espye this foresayde Peter talkynge with a certayne Stricker, a man well stricken in age.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), p. 29.

Stricken hour, a whole hour, marked as completed by the striking of the clock.

He persevered for a stricken hour in such a torrent of unnecessary tattle. Scott.

strickle (stri'k'l), n. [Early mod. E. also strickle, and assimilated strichel, stritchell, stritchell, strichell; < ME. strikile, strykylle (= MD. strickel, streckel, strekel), a strickle; dim. of strik.]

1. A straight-edge used to sweep grain off level with the top of a measure when measuring grain.—2. A wooden swingle for dressing flax.

—3. In carp. and masonry, a pattern or template.—4. In founding: (a) A straight-edge used to remove superfluous sand to a level with the top of a flask after ramming the sand into it. Compare loam-board. (b) A template or pattern used in sweeping patterns in sand or loam.—5. In cutlery, a straight-edge fed with emery, and employed to grind the edges of knives arranged spirally on a cylinder. E. H. Knight.

strickler (stri'k'lér), n. [Also stricker; < strickle + -er.] A strickle or strike. Randle Holme, Acad. of Armory, p. 337. (Nares.) [Local, Eng.] strict (strikt), a. [= F. strict (OF. streit, etc.), < L. strictus, pp. of stringere, draw tight, bind, contract: see stringent, *strain*¹. Cf. strait, the older form of the same word.] 1. Drawn tight; tight; close: as, a strict ligature. Arbuthnot.

The lustful god, with speedy pace,
Just thought to strain her in a strict embrace.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 976.

2. Tense; stiff: as, a strict or lax fiber.—3. Narrow; restricted; confined; strait. [Obsolete or archaic.]

owl.] The owls, or Strigidæ in a broad sense, as a suborder of Raptores: the nocturnal birds of prey. The physiognomy is peculiar by reason of the lateral expansion, lengthwise contraction, and diploic thickening of the skull, which is often asymmetrical. The eyes look forward, not laterally as in other birds, and are set in a peculiar disk of radiated feathers more or less completely formed, the feathers of the front being antorse and adpressed, hiding the base of the bill. This is the facial disk, of which some radiating feathers of peculiar shape and texture constitute a ruff. The eyes are very large, with a peculiarly shaped eyeball, the cornea being protuberant, and with the sclerotic presenting a figure somewhat like a short acorn in its cup; the iris is capable of great movement, dilating and contracting the pupil more than is usual in birds. The ear-parts are very large, often unlike on opposite sides of the head, and provided with a movable external flap, the operculum, sometimes of great extent. The tufts of feathers, or so-called "ears," of many owls are the corniplumes or plumicorns. The bill is peculiar in that the nostrils open at the edge of the cere rather than in its substance, and the tomia are never toothed. There are four toes, of which the outer is versatile and shorter than the inner, with three of its joints together shorter than the fourth joint. The claws are all long, sharp, and curved, and the middle one is sometimes pectinate. The feathers lack after-shafts, and the plumage is peculiarly soft and blended, conferring a noiseless flight. The birds have no ambiens muscle, one pair of intrinsic syringeal muscles, a nude oil-gland, long clubbed caeca, short intestines, moderately muscular gizzard, capacious gullet without special crop, a peculiar structure of the tarsometatarsi and shoulder-joint, a manubriated and double-notched or entire sternum, basipterygoid processes, and spongy maxillolapates and lacrymals. The suborder is divided into two families, Strigidae and Aluonidae. Nyctaraptes is a synonym. See cuts under buras-owl, braccote, Bubo, hawk-owl, Otus, Nyctala, owl, snave-owl, and Strix.

Strigidae (strij'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Strix (Strig-) + -idē.] The owls as a family of strigine or nocturnal birds of prey of the order Raptores: used in three senses. (a) Same as Striges, including all owls. (b) Same as Aluonidae, including only the barn-owls. (c) Including all owls excepting the Aluonidae. In this sense the distinctive characters are the furculum not ankylized to the double-notched or fenestrated sternum, the middle claw not pectinate, and the facial disk incomplete or not triangular.

strigil (strij'il), n. [L. strigilis (= Gr. στρίγις), a scraper, < stringere, draw tight, contract, touch, graze, stroke: see stric.] 1. An instrument of metal, ivory, or horn, used by the ancients for scraping the skin at the bath and in the gymnasium; a flesh-scraper. See cut under Lysippan.—2t. A flesh-brush, or a glove of hair-cloth, rough toweling, or other article used for stimulating the skin by rubbing.

You are treated after the eastern manner, washing with hot and cold water, with oyles, and being rubbed with a kind of strigil of seal's-skin, put on the operator's hand like a glove. Evelyn, Diary, June, 1645.

strigilate (strij'i-lāt), a. [NL. strigilatus*, < strigilis, q. v.] In entom., noting the front leg of a bee when it is furnished with a strigilis.

strigilis (strij'i-lis), n.; pl. strigiles (-lēz). [NL., < L. strigilis, a scraper: see strigil.] An organ on the first tarsal joint of a bee's fore leg, used to curry or clean the antennae; a curry-comb: so called on account of the fringe of stiff hairs. At the end of the tibia is a movable spur, and on this spur an expanded membrane, the velum, which can be brought into contact with the strigilis, forming a circular orifice. The bee lays the antenna in the hollow of the strigilis, presses the velum of the spur upon it, and draws the antenna through the aperture thus formed.

strigillose (strij'i-lōs), a. [Also, erroneously, strigillose; dim. of strigose.] In bot., minutely strigose.

strigine (strij'in), a. [L. strix (Strig-) + -ine.] Owl-like; related to or resembling an owl. (a) Of or pertaining to the Striges, or Strigidae in a broad sense. (b) In a narrow sense, belonging to the Strigidae (c); distinguished from aluine.

strigment (strig'ment), n. [L. strigmentum, that which is scraped off, a scraping, < stringere, draw tight, contract, graze, stroke: see strigil.] Scraping; that which is scraped off.

Brassavolus and many other, beside the strigments and sudorous adhesions from men's hands, acknowledge that nothing proceedeth from gold in the usual decoction thereof. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

Strigopidae (stri-gop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1849), < Strigops + -idae.] The Strigopinae regarded as a family apart from Psittacidae.

Strigopinae (stri-gō-pī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Strigops + -inae.] The owl-parrots; a subfamily of Psittacidae, or the only subfamily of Strigopidae, represented by the genus Strigops. Also Stringopinae. O. Finsch.

Strigops (stri'gops), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1845); also Strigopsis; also Stringops and Strin-gopsis (Van der Hoeven, 1856); < Strix (Strig-), a screech-owl, + Gr. ōp, eye, face.] A genus of Psittacidae, or made type of a family Strigopidae, containing the kakapo, or nocturnal flightless parrot of New Zealand, S. habroptilus; the owl-parrots: so called from the owl's physiognomy. The sternal keel and the furculum are defective, and the birds have not the power of flight. See cut under out-parrot.

strigose (stri'gōs), a. [NL. strigosus, < striga, q. v.] 1. In bot., rough with strigae; beset with sharp-pointed and appressed straight and stiff hairs or bristles: as, a strigose leaf or stem.—2. In entom., streaked, or finely fluted; having fine, close parallel ridges or points, like the surface of a file. Also strigiate.

strigosus (stri'gūs), a. [NL. strigosus: see strigose.] Same as strigose.

strike (stri:k), v.; pret. struck, pp. struck, stricken (obs. or dial. strucken), ppr. striking. But smoothe it heng as doth a strike of flex.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 676.

9. In sugar-making and -refining, the quantity of syrup emptied at one time into the coolers; also, the quantity of sugar boiled or crystallized at one time; as, to boil a strike; to run off a strike.

The strike is now done, air is admitted to the pan, and the contents are run off into the "mixer."

The Century, XXXV. 114.

10. In base-ball: (a) An unsuccessful attempt of the batter to hit the ball. (b) A ball so pitched as to pass over the home-plate, and considered by the umpire as one that the batter should have tried to strike.—11. In American bowling, a play by which one of the contestants knocks down all the pins with one bowl, entitling him to add to his score as many points as the number of the pins knocked down with the first two balls of his next play. Also called ten-strike. Compare spare, n., 2.—12. A concerted or general quitting of work by a body of men or women for the purpose of coercing their employer in some way, as when higher wages or shorter hours are demanded, or a reduction of wages is resisted; a general refusal to work as a coercive measure. Compare lockout.

Accounts at that time [1362] of strikes in the building-trade are particularly numerous.

English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. cxliv.

There have been times and incidents when the strike was the only court of appeals for the workman, and the evil lay in the abuse of them and not in the use of them.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 292.

13. Any unscrupulous attempt to extort money or to obtain other personal advantage by initiating an attack with the intention of being bought off, as by introducing a bill into a legislature, hostile to some moneyed interest, with the hope of being paid to let the matter drop. [Political slang, U. S.]—14. Full measure; especially, in brewing, full measure of malt; thus, ale of the first strike is that which has its full allowance of malt and is strong.

Three hogsheds of ale of the first strike.

Scott.

15. In coining, the whole amount struck at one time.—16. In type-founding, an imperfect matrix for type; the deeply sunken impression of the engraved character on a punch in a short and narrow bar of copper: so called because the punch is struck a hard blow with a hammer. Also known as unjustified matrix, or drive. See type-founding.

When the letter is perfect, it is driven into a piece of polished copper, called the drive or strike. This passes to the justifier, who makes the width and depth of the faces uniform throughout the fount.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 699.

striker-out (stri'k'-out), n. In lawn-tennis, the player who receives, and if possible returns, the ball when first served.

It now becomes the duty of the adversary, called the striker-out, to return the ball by striking it with his racket in such a manner that it shall pass back over the net to the service side.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 179.

striker-plate (stri'k'-plät), n. Same as strike, 17.

striking (stri'king), n. [Verbal n. of strike, v.] 1. The removal of the center upon which an arch has been built. See striking-plate.—2. The propagation of plants by cuttings or slips.

striking (stri'king), p. a. Standing out prominently and conspicuously, so as strongly to impress the eye or the mind; prominent; notable; impressive; remarkable; surprising; as, a striking resemblance; a striking remark.

The most striking characteristic of the poetry of Milton is the extreme remoteness of the associations by means of which it acts on the reader.

Macaulay, Milton.

striking-beam (stri'king-bēm), n. A cylindrical horse on which hides, when removed from the tanning-liquor, are placed. While drying they are struck or scraped from time to time.

strikingly (stri'king-lī), adv. In a striking manner; in such a manner as to surprise or impress; forcibly; impressively.

The force of many strikingly poetic passages has been weakened or unperceived, because their origin was unknown, unexplored, or misunderstood.

T. Warton, Pref. to Milton's Smaller Poems.

strikingness (stri'king-nēs), n. Striking character or quality.

striking plate striking-plat. In carp., in a centering used in erecting an arch of masonry, a device for lowering or setting free the centering under the arch when completed. It consists of a cap and wedge secured by keys. When the keys are drawn out the wedges slip backward, and causes the centering to fall.

striking-solution (stri'king-sō-lū'shōn), n. A weak solution of silver cyanide, with a large proportion of free potassium cyanide, in which metals to be silver-plated are immersed for a few seconds to effect an instantaneous deposit of silver on the metal in order to insure a perfect coating in the silver-bath proper.

strikle, strikleri. Old spellings of strickle, strickler.

string (string), n. [< ME. string, streng, stryng, < AS. streng = MD. strenghe, strenghe, D. streng, streng, streng (strong-), strank (strong-) = LG. streng = OHG. streng, MHG. stranc, strange, G. strang = Icel. streng = Dan. streng = Sw. sträng, a string, line, cord; perhaps < AS. strang, etc., strong (see strong); otherwise akin to L. stringere, draw tight, Gr. σπαγγάω, a halter, σπαγγός, hard-twisted: see strain¹, stringent, strangle.] 1. A slender cord; a thick thread; a line; a twine; a narrow band, thong, or ribbon; also, anything which ties.

I'll knit it up in silken strings,
With twenty odd-conceited true-love knots.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 7. 45.

Queen Mary came tripping down the stair,
With the gold strings in her hair.
Mary Hamilton (Child's Ballads, III. 123).

Vouchsafe to be an azure knight,
When on thy breast and sides Herculean
He fix'd the star and string cerulean.
Swift, Poetry.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

3. The line or cord of a bow.

The best bow that the yeman browthe
Ruben set on a string.
Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 27).

4. In musical instruments, a tightly stretched cord or wire by the vibration of which tones are produced. The materials most used are gut, as in instruments of the lute and viol families, and brass or steel, as in the mandolin, the zither, and the pianoforte, though silk is also used. Silk strings are usually, and metal strings sometimes, wound with light silver wire to increase their weight; and such strings are often called silver strings. The pitch of the tone produced depends on the density, tension, and vibrating length of the string. The vibration is produced either by plucking or twanging with the finger, by a plectrum, or by a jack, as in the lute and harp families generally, and in the harpsichord; by the friction of a bow, as in the viol family; by a stream of air, as in the aeolian harp; or by the blow of a hammer, as in the dulcimer and the pianoforte. The strings are named either by the letters of the tones to which they are tuned, or by numbers. The smallest string of several representatives of the lute and viol families is often called the chanterelle, because commonly used for the principal melody or cantus. The tuning of strings is effected usually by means of tuning-pins or -pegs, which in lutes and viols are placed in the head of the instrument, but in harps, zithers, and pianofortes in one side or rim of the frame. Not only has each instrument had a varying number of strings in different countries and at different periods, but the accordatura, or system of pitches, to which they are tuned has also varied. The vibrating length of the strings in instruments of the lute and viol families may be diminished, and the pitch of their tones raised, by pressing them with the fingers of the left hand against the finger-board. The exact places for such shortening or "stopping" are sometimes marked by frets, as in the guitar and also in the zither. The modern harp is provided with a mechanism for raising the pitch of certain sets of strings one or two semitones by means of pedals.

Of instruments of strings in accord
Herde I so playe a ravynish sweetnesse.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 197.

Ye'll take a lock o' my yellow hair, . . .
Ye'll make a string to your fiddle there.
The Bonny Bunch O' Log Cabin (Child's Ballads, II. 362).

There's not a string attuned to mirth
But has its chord in Melancholy.
Hood, Melancholy.

5. pl. Stringed instruments, especially the stringed instruments of a band or orchestra taken collectively—that is, violins, violas, violoncellos, and double basses—in distinction from the wind and the percussives.

Praise him upon the fiddling pipe.

strongyle (ströng'jīl), n. [< NL. strongylus (see Strongylus), < Gr. στρόγγυλος, round, spherical, < στρογγύω*, draw tight; see strangle.] 1. A spicule of the monaxon biradiate type, with each end rounded off; a strongylate sponge-spicule. It is simply a rhabdus whose two ends are blunt instead of sharp. A strongyle blunt at one end and sharp at the other becomes a strongyloxea. Sollas.

2. In Vermes, a nematoid or threadworm of the genus Strongylus in a broad sense; a strongylid. There are many species. See Strongylidae.

Strongylos (ströng-jī-lōs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στρόγγυλος, round, spherical: see strongyle.] A suborder of chelonognath myriapods, with manducatory mouth, and sexual organs opening in the anterior part of the body. It includes the families Polyxenidae, Polydesmidae, Iulidae, and Lysioptelidae. H. C. Wood, 1865.

strongylid (ströng'jī-līd), a. and n. Same as strongylid.

Strongylidæ (ströng-jī-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Strongylus + -idæ.] A family of endoparasitic nematoid worms, typified by the genus Strongylus, and containing about 10 other genera. They are formidable parasites, sometimes attaining a length of 3 feet, though usually much smaller than this. They are cylindrical, and more or less elongated and filiform; the mouth is oval, circular, or triangular, and armed or unarmed; and a pair of membranous lobes, and usually a pair of protruding spicules. The female is commonly larger than the male. Strongylus bronchialis is the lung-strong of man; the female is an inch long, the male half that size. S. armatus infects the horse; S. merrilli and S. entartus are found in ruminants, as cattle and sheep. Eustrongylus gigas is the giant strongyle of the kidney, the largest known endoparasite of this kind, the male being about a foot long, the female a yard or more. Strongylus quadrilobatus or Sebastosoma duodenale infects the human intestine, and a similar strongyle, Syngamus trachealis, causes the gapes in poultry, occurring in great numbers in the air-passages.

Strongylocentrotus (ströng'jī-lō-sen-trō'tus), n. [NL. (Brandt), < Gr. στρόγγυλος, round, strop (strop), n. [The older and more correct form is strop. Mid. Eng. strop < AS strop "to cut, to trim, to shave." In top, strop, strop, strop, a strop is a strop.] 1. Same as strop. Specific.

strucken (struk'n). An old or dialectal past participle of strike.

structural (struk'tūr-āl), a. [< structure + -al.]

1. Of or pertaining to structure; constructional.

The structural differences which separate Man from the Gorilla and Chimpanzee.

Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 123.

2. Concerned with structure or construction; constructive. [Rare.]

Chaucer . . . had a structural faculty which distinguishes him from all other English poets, his contemporaries

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 254.

3. In biol.: (a) Of or pertaining to structure; morphological; as, structural characters; structural peculiarities. (b) Possessing or characterized by structure; structured; organized.

Structural botany. See botany (b). Structural disease, a disease involving visible (gross or microscopic) changes in the tissues affected. Also called organic and contrasted with functional disease. Structural geology, that branch of geology which has to do with the position and arrangement of the materials composing the crust of the earth, from the point of view of their composition, mode of aggregation, and relations of position, as determined by physical conditions, without special reference to paleontological characters. Nearly the same as stratigraphical geology, or stratigraphy. Also called geotectonic geology.

structuralization (struk'tūr-ā-l-i-zā'shən), n. [< structuralize + -ation.] A making or keeping structural; the act of bringing into or maintaining in structural form or relation. Also spelled structuralisation. [Rare.]

There is the materialisation of motives as the basis of future function, the structuralisation of simple function as the step of an advance to a higher function.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 30.

structurally (struk'tūr-āl-i), adv. In a structural manner; with regard to structure.

structure (struk'tūr), n. [< F. structure = Sp. Pg. estructura = It. struttura, < L. structura, a fitting together, adjustment, building, erection, a building, edifice, structure, < struere, pp. structus, pile up, arrange, assemble, build. Cf. construct, instruct, destroy, etc.] 1. The act of building or constructing; a building up; edification. [Obsolete or rare.]

This door, the sydes make up with structure,
And footes VIII it hold in latitude.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 176.

Pope, R. of the L., iii. 3.

The vaulted polygonal chapter-house is a structure peculiar to England.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 168.

3. An organic form; the combination of parts in any natural production; an organization of parts or elements.

A structure which has been developed through long-continued selection.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 131.

There can be no knowledge of function without a knowledge of some structure as performing function.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 265.

4. Mode of building, construction, or organization; arrangement of parts, elements, or constituents; form; make; used of both natural and artificial productions.

Thy House, whose stately Structure so much cost.

Congreve, Imit. of Horace, II. xiv. 3.

The antistrophic structure [of Æschylus's odes] being perhaps a concession to fashion.

Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 174.

Specifically—(a) In biol., manner or mode of organization; construction and arrangement of tissues, parts, or organs as components of a whole organism; structural or organic morphology; organization; as, animal or vegetable structure; the structure of an animal or a plant; the structure of the brain, of a coral, etc.

Though structure up to a certain point (in the animal organism) is requisite for growth, structure beyond that point impedes growth.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 64.

(b) In geol., various characteristic features, considered collectively, of rocks and of rock-forming minerals, which features differ much in their nature and origin. Stratification, jointing, cleavage, and foliation are among the principal structural peculiarities of rock-masses, which are chiefly to be studied in the field. Some geologists would limit the term structure to petrographic phenomena of this kind, which have been designated as macroscopic rock-structures. The minute structural details of rocks and their components are in part included under the name structure, and in part under that of texture. Thus, a rock may have a crystalline, granular, spherulitic, perlitic, etc., structure, or a flinty, earthy, glassy, etc., texture. But the usages of geologists differ in the employment of terms of this kind, and there can be no precise limit drawn separating textures from structures. In general, however, the structural peculiarities of a rock are those which specially interest the geologist; the textural belong more properly to the mineralogist. Microstructures, or those details of structure belonging to the constituents of rocks which are in general not to be satisfactorily studied without the aid of the microscope, are peculiarly the field of observation of the lithologist. For macro-structures, see brecchia, cleat, cleavage, concretionary, fragmentary, foliation, joint, schist, slate 2 and slaty, and stratification; for microstructures and textures, see amorphous, crystalline, crystalline, crystalline, globulitic, granulitic, granophyllous, and granophyllous, holocrystalline, massive, 5, microcrystalline, microlith and microlithic, cellular, penetrative, perlitic, porphyritic, scoriaceous, spherulitic, trachytic, vesicular, vitreous, and vitrophyre.

Viewed broadly, there are two leading types of structure among rocks—crystalline or massive, and fragmental.

A. Geikie, in Encyc. Brit., x. 229.

Banded, columnar, concentric, epidermal, fibrous, fluidal structure. See the adjectives.—Centric structure. See cellular structure, under cellar.—Flow-and-plunge structure. See flow.—Fluxion-structure. Same as fluidal structure. Globulitic structure, a structure characterized by the predominance of those minute drop-like bodies called by Vogelsang globulites, which are the earliest and simplest forms of the devitrification process in a glassy component of a rock.—Granitoid structure, the structure of granite; a holocrystalline structure.—Tabular structure. See tabular.

structure (struk'tūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. structured, ppr. structuring. [< structure, n.] To form into a structure; organize the parts or elements of in structural form. [Rare.]

What degree of likeness can we find between a man and a mountain? . . . the one has little internal structure, and that irregular, the other is elaborately structured internally in a definite way.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 186.

structureless (struk'tūr-less), a. [< structure + -less.] Without structure; devoid of distinct parts; unorganized; unformed; hence, lacking arrangement; informal; specifically, in biol., having no distinction of parts or organs; not histologically differentiated; not forming or formed into a tissue; homogeneous; amorphous.

structurely (struk'tūr-li), adv. [< structure + -ly.] In structure or formation; by construction. [Rare.]

These aggregates of the lowest order, each formed of physiological units united into a group that is structurely single.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 181.

structurist (struk'tūr-ist), n. [< structure + -ist.] One who makes structures; a builder. [Rare.]

struggle (strug'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. struggled, ppr. struggling. [Early mod. E. also strogell, strogell; < ME. struglen, stroglen, strogelen; perhaps a weakened form of strokelen*, which may be a var. of stroukelen*, the supposed ME. orig. of E. stroll, < MD. struyckelen, D. struikelen = LG. struikeln = MHG. struicheln, G. straucheln, stumble: see stroll.] To put forth violent effort, as in an emergency or as a result of intense excitement; act or strive strenuously against some antagonistic force or influence; be engaged in an earnest effort or conflict; labor or contend urgently, as for some object; used chiefly of persons, but also, figuratively, of things.

Orul was his heer and as the gold it shoon,
And strutted as a faine, large and brode.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 129.

The mizens strutted with the gale.

Chapman, Iliad, l. 464.

The belling canvas strutted with the gale. Dryden.

2. To stand or walk stiffly with the tail erect and spread, as the peacock, the turkey, and various other birds. It is characteristic of the male in the breeding-season. See showing off, 2, and cuts under peacock and turkey.

3. To walk with a pompous gait and erect head, as from pride or affected dignity.

Does he not hold up his head, . . . and strut in his gait?
Shak., M. W. of W., l. 4. 31.

Meanly to sneak out of difficulties into which they had proudly strutted. Burke, American Taxation.

II.† trans. 1. To cause to swell; enlarge; give more importance to.

I will make a brief list of the particulars themselves in an historical truth noways strutted nor made greater by language. Bacon, War with Spain.

2. To protrude; cause to bulge.

Or else [the lands] lifting vp themselves in Hills, knitting their furrowed browes, and strutting out their goggle eyes to watch their treasure, which they keep imprisoned in their stonie walls. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 829.

*strut*¹ (strut), n. [< ME. strut, strout, strot: see *strut*¹, v.] 1. A proud step or walk, with the head erect; affected dignity in walking.

Stynt of thy strot & fyne to flyte,

A sech hys bly the ful sweste & swythe.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 353.

2. Stubbornness; obstinacy. [Prov. Eng.]—
3†. Dispute; contention; strife. Havelok, l. 1039.

*strut*¹, p. a. [Contr. pp. of *strut*¹, v.] Swelling out; protuberant; bulging.

He beginneth now to return with his belly strut and full.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus Marcellinus, p. 213. (Trench.)

*strut*² (strut), n. [Cf. Icel. strútr, a hood jutting out like a horn, = Norw. strut, a spout, nozzle, = Sw. strut, a paper cornet; cf. LG. strutt, stiff, rigid; from the root of *strut*¹; see *strut*¹, v.] A brace or support for the reception of direct thrust, pressure, or weight in construction; any piece of wood or iron, or other member of a structure, designed to support a part or parts by pressure in the direction of its length. Struts may be either upright, diagonal, or horizontal. The struts of a roof extend obliquely from a rafter to a king post or queen-post. Diagonal struts are also used between joists, to prevent them from sagging. See cuts under roof and joist.

*strut*² (strut), v. t.; pret. and pp. strutted, ppr. strutting. [< *strut*², n.] To brace or support by a strut or struts, in construction of any kind; hold in place or strengthen by an upright, diagonal, or transverse support.

strut-beam (strut'bēm), n. A collar-beam.

struthian (strō'thi-ān), a. [< Struthio + -an.]

Struthidea (strō'thid-ē-ā), n. [NL. (J. Gould, 1826), < Gr. στρουθία, a small bird, a sparrow, + είδος, form.] An Australian genus of jay-like birds, belonging to the family Corvidæ, having the wings short, the tail moderately long and graduated, the nostrils exposed, and the bill stout and conical. The only species is S. cinerea, 12½ inches long, gray with black bill, feet, and tail, and white eyes. Also called Brachystoma and Brachyprorus.

struthiiform (strō'thi-i-fōrm), a. Same as struthioniform.

Struthio (strō'thi-ō), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760; Linnæus, 1766), < L. struthio, < Gr. στρουθίων, the ostrich, < στρουθός, a sparrow, < ὄμεις < στρουθός, 'the big sparrow,' the ostrich: see ostrich.] The only genus of Struthionidæ, having but two toes, and so many other important structural characters that in some systems it is made the sole representative of an order Struthiones. S. camelus, the African ostrich, is the only established species; there are nominally two others, S. australis of South Africa, and S. molybdophanes of Somali-land. The genus formerly included some other struthious birds, as the American ostriches, now called Rhea. See cut under ostrich.

Struthiocamelus (strō'thi-ō-ka-mē'lus), n. [NL., < L. struthiocamelus, for struthocamelus*, < Gr. στρουθοκάμηλος, the ostrich, < στρουθός, sparrow, + κάμηλος, camel: see camel.] Same as Struthio.

struthioid (strō'thi-oid), a. [< Gr. στρουθίων, the ostrich, + είδος, form.] Ostrich-like; struthious to any extent; especially, struthious in the narrowest sense.

Struthiolaria (strō'thi-ō-lā-ri-ā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1812),] In conch., a genus of gastropods, typical of the family Struthiolariidæ: so called because the lip of the shell has been compared to the foot of an ostrich.

Struthiolariidæ (strō'thi-ō-lā-ri-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthiolaria + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Struthiolaria. The animal has slender tentacles with eyes at their external bases, an oval foot, and a characteristic dentition (the central tooth being squarish, the lateral wide, five marginal teeth falciform, and the supplementary ones very narrow). The shell is bucciniform with oval subcanaliculate aperture. The living species are confined to the southern Pacific.

struthiolarioid (strō'thi-ō-lā-ri-oid), a. Of, or having characteristics of, the Struthiolariidæ.

Struthiones (strō'thi-ō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Struthio, q. v.] 1. The ostriches in a broad sense; the struthious or ratite birds. See Ratitæ, and cuts under cassowary, Dromæus, emu, ostrich, and Rhea.—2. An ordinal group restricted to the genus Struthio. A. Newton.

Struthionidæ (strō'thi-on-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthio + -idæ.] The ostrich family, variously restricted. (a) Containing the genera Struthio, Rhea, Cassuarina, and Dromæus, and divided into Struthioninae and Cassuarinae, same as Struthioninae, 1. (b) Containing the genera Struthio and Rhea. Same as Struthioninae (a). (c) Containing only the genus Struthio, or the two-toed African ostriches alone. The differences between these ostriches and all other birds is about as great as those usually held to characterize orders in ornithology. The digits are only two, the hallux and inner digit being aborted, leaving the third and fourth digits with the usual ratio of phalanges (4, 5), and there are corresponding modifications of the lower end of the metatarsus. The leg-bones are greatly elongated, and there is a pubic symphysis. The fore limb is reduced, with the antebrachium not half so long as the humerus; and the manus has three digits, two of which bear claws. The wings are useless for flight. There are thirty-five precaudal vertebrae, and the bodies of the sacral vertebrae ankylose with the fore ends of the pubes and ischia. The sternum is doubly notched on each side behind. There are important cranial and especially palatal characters. The plumage is not after-shedded.

Struthiolaria struthionina.

struthioniform (strō'thi-on-i-fōrm), a. [Also irreg. struthiiform; < NL. struthioniformis, < L. struthio + -n, an ostrich, + forma, form.] Resembling an ostrich in the sense of being dromæognathous, as a tinamou; of or pertaining to the Struthioniformes.

Struthioniformes (strō'thi-on-i-fōr'mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of struthioniformis: see struthioniform.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system of classification, a cohort of Gallinæ, composed of the South American tinamou, or Crypturus, and coextensive with the Dromæognathæ of Huxley; so called from their resemblance in some respects (notably palatal structure) to struthious birds.

Struthioninae (strō'thi-ō-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthio + -inae.] The ostriches, variously restricted. (a) A subfamily of Struthionidæ (a), containing the genera Struthio and Rhea, or the African and American ostriches, thus contrasted with Cassuarinae, the cassowaries and emus. (b) A subfamily of Struthionidæ (b); contrasted with Rheinae. (c) The only subfamily of Struthionidæ (c), conterminous therewith.

struthionine (strō'thi-ō-nin), a. [< NL. struthioninus, < L. struthio + -inus, an ostrich: see Struthio.] Resembling or related to an ostrich more or less closely; in a narrow sense, of or pertaining to the Struthioninae; in a wide sense, struthious; ratite.

struthious (strō'thi-us), a. [< NL. Struthio + -ous.] Ostrich-like; resembling or related to the ostriches; struthiiform; ratite.

strutter (strut'er), n. [< *strut*¹ + -er.] One who struts; a pompous fellow. Imp. Dict.

strutting (strut'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *strut*², v.] In carp., diagonal braces between joists, to prevent side deflection.

strutting-beam (strut'ing-bēm), n. A collar-beam.

struttingly (strut'ing-li), adv. In a strutting manner; with a proud step; boastingly.

strutting-piece (strut'ing-pēs), n. Same as bridging.

struvite (strō'vit), n. [Named after Struve, a Russian statesman.] A hydrous phosphate of ammonium and magnesium, often occurring in connection with guano-deposits. It is found in orthorhombic crystals, often hemimorphic, and has a white or pale-yellow color and vitreous luster.

struyt, v. t. A Middle English form of stroy.

stry (stri), v. t.; pret. and pp. stried, ppr. strying. An obsolete or dialectal form of stroy.

strychnia (stri'kni-ā), n. [NL., < Strychnos, q. v.] Same as strychnine.

strychnic (stri'nik), a. [< NL. strychnia + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, obtained from, or including strychnine; as, strychnic acid.

strychnina (stri'ni-nā), n. A form of strychnine.

strychnine, strychnin (stri'nin), n. [< NL. Strychnos + -ine, -in.] A vegetable alkaloid (C₂₁H₂₂N₂O₂), the sole active principle of Strychnos Tieutii, the most active of the Java poisons, and one of the active principles of S. Ignatii, S. Nux-vomica, S. colubrina, etc. It is usually obtained from the seeds of S. Nux-vomica. It is colorless, inodorous, crystalline, unalterable by exposure to the air, and extremely bitter. It is little soluble, requiring 7,000 parts of water for solution. It dissolves in hot alcohol, although sparingly, if the alcohol be pure and not diluted. It forms crystallizable salts, which are intensely bitter. Strychnine and its salts, especially the latter from their solubility, are most energetic poisons. They produce tetanic spasms, but are used in medicine especially in conditions of exhaustion and certain forms of paralysis. See cut under nux-vomica.—Hall's solution of strychnine. See solution.

strychninism (stri'ni-nizm), n. [< strychnine + -ism.] The condition produced by an excessive dose of strychnine.

strychnism (stri'nizm), n. [< strychnia + -ism.] The hyperexcitable state of the spinal cord produced by strychnine.

strychnized (stri'nizd), a. Brought under the influence of strychnine.

Strychnos (stri'nos), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. strychnos, < Gr. στρυχνος or στρυγνος, a plant of the nightshade kind.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Loganiaceæ and tribe Euloganieæ, type of the subtribe Strychnææ. It is characterized by flowers with valvate corolla-lobes, and a usually two-celled ovary which becomes in fruit an indehiscent berry, commonly globose and pulpy with a hardened rind. About 65 species have been described, widely scattered through tropical regions. They are trees or shrubs, often vines climbing high by stiff hooked and recurved tendrils, in a few species armed with straight spines. They have opposite membranous or coriaceous three- to five-nerved leaves, and small or rather long salver-shaped flowers in terminal or axillary cymes, usually white and densely aggregated. Many species yield powerful poisons, sometimes of great medicinal value. For species yielding strychnine, see strychnine; for S. Nux-vomica, see also nux-vomica, brucine, and Agavebark (under bark); for S. Tiedti, chittik; for S. columbiana, subcordata; for S. Linnati, St. Ignatius beans, under beans; for S. texifera, see carari; for S. Pseudoquina, capacha; for S. potatorum (also called water-plantain), see clarin-plant. The root of West African species is used in ordeals. Although the seeds are usually poisonous, the fruit of several species, as in India of S. potatorum, in Java of S. Tiedti, and in Egypt and Senegal of S. innocua, contains a pulp which is an article of food. S. pilosorum, the Queensland strychnine-tree, is an evergreen shrubby climber, sometimes cultivated.

stuard, stuart, n. Old spellings of steward.

Stuartia (stū-ār-ti-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), named after John Stuart, Marquis of Bute, a patron of botany.] 1. A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Ternstroemiaceae and tribe Gordoniaceae. It is characterized by flowers with nearly equal sepals, and an ovary which contains two ascending ovules in each of its five cells, and ripens into a loculicidal and somewhat woody capsule with lenticular seeds, little albumen, and a straight embryo with a slender inferior radicle. There are 6 species, natives of North America and Japan. They are shrubs with membranous deciduous leaves, and short-peduncled flowers solitary in the axils, often large and showy, each usually of five imbricated petals, and numerous stamens with versatile anthers. Two handsome white-flowered species, from the mountains of Virginia, Kentucky, and southward, are sometimes cultivated under the name of stuartia - S. Virginica with a single style, and S. pentagyna with five styles and larger leaves. S. Pseudo-Camelia, from Japan, is also in cultivation in ornamental grounds.

2. [l. c.] A shrub of this genus.

stub (stub), n. [ME. stub, stuppe, < AS. styp = D. stobbe = LG. stuppe = Icel. stubb, stobbi, also stubb = Norw. stubb, stubb = Sw. stuppe, stubb = Dan. stub, a stump, stub. Cf. Gael. stob, a stake, stub, Lith. stebas, an upright pillar, mast, l. stipes, a post, Gr. στύβη, a stump, Skt. stambha, a post, √ stambh, make firm, set fast. Cf. stump and stubble.] 1. The end of a fallen tree, shrub, or plant remaining in the ground; a stump; now, especially, a short stump or projecting root of inconspicuous size. Here stands a drie stub of some tree, a cubite from the ground. Chapman, Iliad, xxiii. 305.

2. A projection like a stump; a piece or part of something sticking out; as, a dog with only a stub of a tail; the stub of a broken tooth.

The horn [of the buffalo] at three months is about 1 inch in length, and is a mere little black stub. W. T. Hornaday, Smithsonian Report (1887), ii. 397.

3. A short remaining piece of something; a terminal remnant: as, the stub of a pencil or of a cigar; a stub of candle.—4. A worn horseshoe-nail; a stub-nail; specifically, in the plural, nails, or bits of iron of the quality of old horseshoe-nails, used as material for gun-barrels or other articles requiring great toughness.

Every blacksmith's shop rung with the rhythmical clang of busy hammers, beating out old iron, such as horse-shoes, nails, or stubs, into the great harpoons. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xvi.

5. Something truncated, resembling a small stump, or constituting a terminal remnant. (a) A blunt-pointed pen; a stub-pen. (b) A stationary stud in a lock, which acts as a detent for the tumblers when their slots are in engagement with it. (c) A short file adapted to working in and around depressions that cannot be reached by an ordinary file. (d) The unsawed butt-end of a plank. See stub-shot, 1.

6. The inner end of one of the duplicate numbered blanks in a check-book or the like, which is left in the book with a memorandum corresponding to the check or other blank which is filled out and detached; counterfoil.—7†. Figuratively, a block; a blockhead.

Our dullest and laziest youth, our stocks and stubs. Milton, Education.

Stub damascus. See damascus.

stub (stub), v. t.; pret. and pp. stubbed, ppr. stubby. [= Sw. stubby = Dan. stuppe, cut short, dock, curtail; from the noun.] 1. To grub up by the roots; pull or raise the stub of; pull or raise as a stub: as, to stub a tree; to stub up roots.

The other tree was griev'd,
Grew scrubbed, died a-top, was stunted;
So the next parson stubb'd and burnt it.
Swift, Baucis and Philemon.

2. To clear of stubs; grub up stubs or roots from, as land.

Nobbut a bit on it's left, an' I mean'd to 'a stubb'd it at fall. Tennyson, Northern Farmer (Old Style).

A large fenced-in field, well stubbed, on which the manure from the cattle is spread. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 424.

3. To make a stub of; cut to a stub; give a truncated or stubbed appearance to; truncate: as, to stub off a post or a quill pen.—4. To ruin by extravagance. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—5. To strike against something projecting from a surface; stump: as, to stub one's foot. [U. S.]

stubbed (stub'ed or stubd), a. [< stub + -ed².]

1. Resembling a stub; short and blunt; truncated.

Hang upon our stubbed horns
Garlands, ribbands, and fine posies.
B. Jonson, Masque of Oberon.

2. Rough with roots and stumps; stubby.

Then came a bit of stubbed ground, once a wood.
Browning, Childe Roland.

3. Blunt or rugged in character; not delicate or sensitive; hardy.

The hardness of stubbed vulgar constitutions renders them insensible of a thousand things that fret and gall those delicate people. Ep. Berkeley, Siris, § 105.

stubbedness (stub'ed-nes), n. Bluntness; obtuseness.

stubbiness (stub'i-nes), n. 1. The state of being stubby.—2. Same as stubbedness.

stubble (stub'l), n. [Also dial. stopple; < ME. stubble, stubbil, stobil, stobul, stouple, < OF. stuble, estuble, estoble, estouble, estoule, estouille, estoule, F. étouble, éteule = Pr. estobia = It. stoppa = MD. D. stoppel = LG. stoppele, stoppele = OHG. stufila, MHG. stufel, G. stoppele, stubble; all appar. < L. stipula, dim. of stipes, a stalk, etc.: see stipule. The word has been confused in ML., etc., with L. stippa, stupa, stipa, tow, and in E. with stub.] 1. The lower ends of grain-stalks, collectively, left standing in the ground when the crop is cut; the covering of a harvested field of grain.

They turned in their stubble to sow another croppe of wheate in the same place. Coryat, Crudities, I. 151.

2. Something resembling or analogous to stubble, especially a short rough beard, or the short hair on a cropped head. See stubby.

stubbled (stub'ld), a. [< stubble + -ed².] 1. Covered with stubble; stubby.

A crow was strutting o'er the stubbled plain,
Just as a lark, descending, clos'd his strain.
Gay, To the Right Hon. Paul Methuen.

2†. Stubbled.

stubble-field (stub'l-fēld), n. A field covered with stubble; a piece of ground from which grain has been cut.

stubble-geese (stub'l-gēs), n. [< ME. stubbil-geos; < stubble + geose.] 1. The graylag goose, Anser cinereus. Also called harvest-geese.

Of many a pilgrim hastow Cysters curs,
For thy perely yet they fare the wors
That they han eten with thy stubbil geos.
Chaucer, Prologue to Cook's Tale, l. 27.

2. See the quotation, and compare green-geese.

So stubble-geese at Michaelmas are seen Upon the spit; next May produces green.
W. King, Art of Cookery, l. 77.

stubble-land (stub'l-land), n. Land covered with stubble; a stubble-field. Shak., I. Hen. IV., i. 3. 35.

stubble-plow (stub'l-plou), n. A plow especially adapted for turning up stubby ground.

stubble-rake (stub'l-rāk), n. A rake for gleaming a reaped field.

stubble-turner (stub'l-tēr'nēr), n. A wing attachment to a plow to turn down stubble, etc., in advance of the plowshare.

stubby (stub'li), a. [< stubble + -y¹.] 1. Covered with stubble; stubbed.

He . . . rubbed his stubby chin with a sort of bewildered thoughtfulness. Harper's Mag., LXXX. 357.

2. Resembling stubble; short and stiff.

A young man of aggressive manners, whose stubby black hair stood out from his head. The Century, XXXVII. 600.

stub-book (stub'būk), n. A book containing only stubs, and serving as a record of the checks or other papers detached from them.

The filed stub-books of stamps, now occupying a very large and rapidly increasing space in the files-rooms. Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, p. 700.

stubborn (stub'orn), a. [Early mod. E. also stubburne, stoburne; < ME. stoburn, stoburne, styburne, stiburn, stiborn, stibourne; prob. orig. stibor*, stibor* (the final n being due to misdividing of the derived noun stibornesse taken as stibornesse* (E. stubbornness), or a mere addition as in *bittern*¹, slattern), appar. < AS. styp, a stump, stub, + adj. formative -or as in AS. bitor, E. bitter, etc.] 1†. Sturdy; stout; strong.

I was yong and ful of ragerye,
Stibourne and strong and joly as a pye.
Chaucer, Prologue to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 456.

2. Fixed or set in opinion or purpose; obstinately determined; inflexibly resolute; not to be moved by persuasion; unyielding.

The queen is obstinate,
Stubborn to justice, apt to accuse it, and Disdainful to be tried by t.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 122.

Some of them, for their stubborn refusing the Grace he had offered them, were adjudged to Death, and the rest fined. Baker, Chronicles, p. 172.

3. Persistently obdurate; obtuse to reason or right; obstinately perverse. [This sense depends upon the connection, and is not always clearly distinguishable from the preceding, since what is justifiable or natural persistence from one point of view may be sheer perversity from another.]

And he that holdithe a quarel agayn right,
Holdyng his purpos stiburn agayn reason.
Lydgate, Order of Fools.

They ceased not from their own doings, nor from their stubborn way. Judges ii. 19.

Sirrah, thou art said to have a stubborn soul,
That apprehends no further than this world.
Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 485.

From the necessity of bowing down the stubborn neck of their pride and ambition to the yoke of moderation and virtue. Burke, Rev. in France.

4. Persistently pursued or practised; obstinately maintained; not readily abandoned or relinquished.

Stubborn attention, and more than common application. Locke.

Proud as he is, that iron heart retains Its stubborn purpose, and his friends disdain.
Pope, Iliad, ix. 742.

Stout were their hearts, and stubborn was their strife. Scott, The Poacher.

5. Difficult of treatment or management; hard to deal with or handle; not easily manipulated; refractory; tough; unyielding; stiff.

Facts are stubborn things. Proverbial saying.

In hissing flames huge silver bars are roll'd,
And stubborn brass, and tin, and solid gold.
Pope, Iliad, xviii. 546.

While round them stubborn thorns and furze increase,
And creeping briars. Dyer, Fleece, l. 107.

Not Hope herself, with all her flattering art,
Can cure this stubborn sickness of the heart.
Crabbe, Works, I. 140.

Stubborn marble is that which, on account of its excessive hardness, is very difficult to work, and is apt to fly off in splinters. Marble-Worker, § 35.

6†. Harsh; rough; rude; coarse in texture or quality.

Like strict men of order,
They do correct their bodies with a bench
Or a poor stubborn table.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iv. 2.

Their Cloth [made from bark] . . . is stubborn when new, wears out soon. Dampier, Voyages, I. 315.

If Hector's Spouse was clad in stubborn Stuff,
A Soldier's Wife became it well enough.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

= Syn. 2 and 3. Refractory, Intractable, etc. (see obstinate); wilful, headstrong, unruly, inflexible, obdurate, ungovernable, indocile, mulish.

stubborn (stub'orn), v. t. [< stubborn, a.] To make stubborn; render stiff, unyielding, enduring, or the like. [Rare.]

Slaty ridge Stubborn'd with iron. Keats, Hyperion, ii.

stubbornly (stub'orn-li), adv. In a stubborn manner; inflexibly; obstinately.

stubbornness (stub'orn-nes), n. [Early mod. E. stubburnesse; < ME. styburnesse, stibornesse, etc.: see stubborn.] The state or character of being inflexible or stubborn; obstinate persistence, obduracy, or refractoriness.

stubborn-shafted (stub'orn-shāf'ted), a. Having a stiff or unyielding shaft or trunk. [Rare.]

Before a gloom of stubborn-shafted oaks, Three . . . horsemen waiting. Tennyson, Geraint.

stubby (stub'i), a. [< stub + -y¹.] 1. Abounding with stubs.—2. Short, thick, and stiff; stubbed: as, stubby bristles; stubby fingers.

stub-damask (stub'dam'ask), n. A kind of damaskeened iron made of stubs, used for shot-gun barrels. See stub-twist.

Stub damask is made from the same materials as stub twist, but the rods after the first drawing are subjected to a high degree of torsion, and two or three of them are then welded laterally to form the ribbon. Amer. Cyc., VII. 356.

stub-end (stub'end'), n. In mach., the enlarged rectangular end or prism of a pitman or connecting-rod, over which the strap of a strap-joint passes, forming with the end of the prism a rectangular inclosure which holds the brasses or boxes fitted to a crank-wrist or to a cross-head pin. Or call up the master, and break his dull noddle.

B. Jonson, Leges Convivales, v.

stum (stum), v. t.; pret. and pp. stummed, ppr. stumming. [Also stoom; < D. stoomen; from the noun: see stum, n.] 1. To prevent from fermenting; operate upon (wine) in a manner to prevent after-fermentation in casks. A common method is, before filling them, to burn sulphur in the casks with the bung-holes stopped. The sulphur is coated upon a linen rag, lighted, and then dropped in through the bung-hole, which is thereupon immediately closed. The wood of the cask is thus saturated with sulphur dioxide, which destroys all the germs of fermentation contained in it, and when the wine is put in a minute portion of the sulphur dioxide is dissolved in the liquor. Sodium sulphite added to wine in small quantity produces a similar result. Salicylic acid in minute quantity also prevents after-fermentation. A few drops of oil of mustard or a little mustard-seed dropped into wine will also stum it.

When you with High-Dutch Heeren dine, Expect false Latin and stum'd Wine.

Prior, Upon a Passage in Scaligeriana.

We stum our wines to renew their spirits.

Sir J. Floyer.

Stirpe, Order of City of London, 1569 (quoted in Ribbton-Limner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 104).

= Syn. 2. Stout, stalwart, etc. (see robust), brawny, sinewy, muscular, firm.

sturdy² (stér'di), n. [cf. Gael. stuir, stuirdean, vertigo, a disease of sheep (cf. E.); cf. OF. estorda, giddiness, cf. estordi, stunned, stupefied: see *sturdy*¹.] A disease of sheep caused by the presence in the brain of the cerebrum, or cystic larval form of the dog's tapeworm, Tenia caninus. The cysts vary in size from that of a pea to that of a pigeon's egg. The disease is marked by lack or loss of coordination in muscular action, evinced in a disposition to stagger, move sidewise, or sit on the rump, and also by stupor. Sturdy generally attacks sheep under two years old, and is rarely cured, since puncturing or trephining gives but temporary relief. Also called gid and staggers.

sture, n. A Scotch form of *sturdy*³.

sturgeon (stér'jon), n. [cf. ME. sturjoun, sturjoune, cf. AF. sturjoune, OF. esturgeon, later estourjeon, F. esturgeon = Sp. esturion = Pg. esturão = It. sturgeon, cf. ML. sturgeon, sturgio (n.), cf. OHG. sturjo, sturo, MHG. sture, stur, stür, G. stur = D. stur = Sw. stur = Icel. stýrja = AS. stýrja, stýrja, stýrja; cf. prob. lit. "a stirrer" (so called, it has been conjectured, because it stirs up mud by floundering at the bottom of the water), cf. OHG. storen, MHG. sturen, G. stören, etc., stir: see *stir*¹.] A chondroganoid fish of the order Chondrostei and family Acipenseridae (see the technical names). There are 2 leading genera, Acipenser and Scaphirhynchus, or ordinary and shovel-nosed sturgeons. Of the latter there are 4 species, confined to the fresh waters of the United States and some parts of Asia, as S. platyrhynchus of the former country, a foot long (see cut under shovel-nose). The common sturgeon of the Atlantic, anadromous in Europe and North America, is A. sturio. Another, of the Atlantic coast of the United States, is the short-nosed sturgeon, A. brevirostris. The small or Ruthenian sturgeon, or sterlet, of some European waters is A. ruthenus. (See sterlet, with cut.) The great white sturgeon, beluga, or huso of Pontocaspian waters, is A. huso; this is the largest known, 12 or 15 feet or more in length, weighing 1,000 pounds or more, and an important source of isinglass and of caviar. The white sturgeon of the Columbia and Snake rivers, A. transmontanus, an important food-fish, of from 300 to 600 pounds weight. The green sturgeon of the same waters is A. medirostris, supposed to be unfit for food. An isolated and very distinct species, land-locked in fresh waters of the United States, is A.

geons, the Polyodontidae. See cuts under paddle-fish, Psephurus, and Spatularia.

Sturion (stū-ri-ō'nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ML. sturio, sturgeon: see sturgeon.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the first order of chondropterygious fishes: same as Chondrostei.

2. See cuts under paddle-fish, Psephurus, Spatularia, sterlet, and sturgeon.—2. Same as Acipenseridae. Bonaparte, 1817.

sturionian (stū-ri-ō-ni-an), a. and n. [cf. NL. Sturion = -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to the sturgeons, or having their characters; acipenserine.

II. n. A sturgeon; an acipenserid.

sturionidian (stū-ri-ō-ni-dian), n. [cf. Sturion = -id + -ian.] A fish of the order Chondrostei; a sturgeon-like fish. Sir J. Richardson.

sturionine (stū-ri-ō-nin), a. and n. [cf. Sturion = -ine.] Same as sturionian.

sturk, n. See stirk.

Sturmian (stér'mi-an), a. [cf. Sturm (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the French mathematician J. C. F. Sturm (1803–55).—Sturmian function, one of the series of remainders obtained in the process of finding the greatest measure of an integral function and its derivative, provided the sign of each is changed as we proceed.

Sturnella (stér-nel'ä), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), cf. Sturnus + dim. -ella.] A remarkable genus of Icteridae, typical of the subfamily Sturnellinae, containing the American meadow-starlings or so-called field-larks. The bill is of peculiar shape, longer than the head, with straight outlines, abruptly angulated commissure, and flattened culmen extending on the forehead. The feet are large and strong, reaching beyond the tail when outstretched, eminently fitted for terrestrial locomotion. The wings are short and rounded, and the tail is very short, with stiffish narrow acute feathers. The coronal feathers are bristle-tipped; and the plumage is much variegated, the under parts being yellow with a black horseshoe on the breast.

There is one species with several geographical races, or several species, inhabiting Mexico, Central America, and most parts of North America and the West Indies. S. magna is the common meadow-lark of the eastern United States, and S. neglecta is characteristic of the western prairies. The genus formerly included those related South American birds in which the yellow is replaced by red, now called Trupialis or Pezetes. Also called Pedoparis. See also cut under meadow-lark.

Sturnellinae (stér-ne-lin'e), n. pl. [NL., cf. Sturnella + -inae.] A subfamily of Icteridae, represented by the genera Sturnella and Trupialis. Coues, 1884.

sturnelline (stér-ne-lin), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sturnella or the subfamily Sturnellinae.

Sturnia (stér-ni-ä), n. [NL. (Lesson, 1847), cf. L. sturnus, starling: see Sturnus.] A genus of Oriental starlings. The species, of which there are few, range from eastern Siberia and Japan through China to Burma, the Philippines, Moluccas, etc. The type is S. sinensis, the kink of early French ornithologists (kink oricle of Latham, 1783), with many New Latin synonyms; its plumage is much varied with glossy blackish, greenish, and purplish, and different shades of gray, buff, isabel, and salmon-color; the bill is blue and the eyes are white; the length is about 8 inches. This bird is chiefly Chinese, but is wide-ranging. S. sturnina (the dominican thrush of Latham, with a host of synonyms) extends from Siberia and northern China through the Malay peninsula, etc. A third species is S. violacea, with fifteen or more different Latin names and a few English ones; this is especially Japanese, but migrates in winter to the Philippines, the Moluccas, Borneo, and Celebes.

Sturnidae (stér-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., cf. Sturnus + -idae.] A family of oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Sturnus; the Old World starlings. They have ten primaries, of which the first is short or spurious; the wings are lengthened or moderate; the frontal antæ extend into the nasal fossæ; there are no rictal vibrissæ; and the bill is atypically conic-acute, with blunt, rounded, or flattened culmen, ascending gony, and angulated commissure. The plumage is mostly of metallic or iridescent hues, sometimes splendidly lustrous or beautifully variegated, or both. The family is a large one, widely diffused in the Old World, excepting in Australia, and entirely absent from America. Both its limits and its subdivisions vary with different writers. See cuts under Buphaga, Eulabes, Pastor, starling, and Temenuchus.

sturniform (stér-ni-fōrm), a. [cf. L. sturnus, a starling, + -formis, form.] Having the form or technical characters of the starlings; sturnoid; of or pertaining to the Sturniformes.

sturniform (stér-ni-fōrm), a. [cf. L. sturnus, a starling, + -formis, form.] Having the form or technical characters of the starlings; sturnoid; of or pertaining to the Sturniformes.

sturnoid (stér-noid), a. [cf. Sturnus + -oid.] Of or pertaining to the family Sturnidae.—Sturnoid Passeres, one of four groups or series in which A. R. Wallace (Ibis, 1874, pp. 406–416) distributed the normal oscine passerine birds, the others being the typical or turdoid, the tanagroid, and the formicarioid Passeres. They are otherwise called Sturniformes, and include the starling group, a characteristic feature of which is the possession of ten primaries, of which the first is spurious. See cuts under *starling*¹, Pastor, Scissirostrum, Eulabes, Temenuchus, and Buphaga.

Sturnopastor (stér-nō-pas'tor), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1843, as Sternopastor), cf. Sturnus + Pastor, q. v.] A genus of starlings with bare circumorbital spaces and comparatively rounded wings. There are several species, as S. contra of India, S. supercilialis of Burma, S. jalla and S. melanoptera of Java.

Sturnus (stér'nus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760; Linnæus, 1766), cf. L. sturnus, a starling: see *star*² and *starn*².] The representative genus of Sturninae, formerly employed with latitude, now closely restricted to such forms as the common stare or starling, S. vulgaris. The plumage is metallic and iridescent, with distinctly outlined individual feathers. The feet are short and typically oscine. The tail is about half as long as the wings, emarginate, with twelve rectrices. The wings are pointed by the second and third primaries, the first being spurious and very small. The bill is not bristled; feathers fill the interramal space, and extend into the nasal fossæ; there is a nasal scale, and the tomial edges of the bill are dilated; the commissure is angulated, and the culmen and gony are both nearly straight; the culmen extends on the forehead, parting well-marked antæ. See cut under starling.

sturt¹ (stért), v. [An obs. or dial. var. of *stert*¹, *sturt*¹.] I. trans. To vex; trouble. Burns. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

II. intrans. To start from fright; be afraid. Burns, Halloween. [Scotch.]

sturt² (stért), n. [Also dial. transposed sturt; cf. *sturt*¹, v.] 1. Trouble; disturbance; vexation; wrath; heat of temper. [Scotch.]

Scotland has cause to mak great sturt
For haiming of the Laird of Mow.
Raid of the Reidsuire (Child's Ballads, VI. 137).

2. In Eng. mining, an extraordinary profit made by a tributer by taking at a high tribute a "pitch" which happens to cut an unexpectedly large body of ore, so that his profit is correspondingly great. [Cornwall, Eng.]

stylamblys (sti-lam'blis), n. [NL. < Gr. στίλος, a pillar, + ἀμβλύνω, blunt, dulled.] A small blunt process of the inner branch of a pleopod of some crustaceans. C. Spence Bate.

stylar (sti'lār), a. [Also stilar; < style¹ + *-ar*³.] Of or pertaining to a style; having the character of or resembling a style for writing.

Stylaria (sti-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1816), < Gr. στίλος, a pillar, + -aria.] A genus of annelids: same as Nais, 1.

Stylaster (sti-las'tēr), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1831), < Gr. στίλος, a pillar, + αστήρ, a star.] 1. The typical genus of Stylasteridae. It was formerly considered actinozoan, and placed in the family Oculinidae; it is now known to be hydrozoan, and closely related to Millepora.

2. [f. c.] Any polyp of the family Stylasteridae. The numerous species are delicate calcareous corals, usually pink, and most nearly related to the millepores.

Stylasteridae (sti-las-ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Stylaster + -idae.] A family of the order Hydrocorallinae, or coralligenous hydromedusans, typified by the genus Stylaster, related to the Milleporidae, and with the millepores forming the order. Stylasteridae differ from Milleporidae in having a calcified axial style at the base of an ampulla or dilated section of each gastrozooid, and in the more complicated cyclostomes the massive hydrosome contains tubes which possess pseudosoma formed by the regular position of the tentacular zooids; the alimentary zooids have from four to twelve tentacles. The stylasters abound in tropical seas, where they contribute to the formation of coral reefs.

style¹ (sti'lāt), a. [< NL. stylatus*, prop. stilatus*, < L. stilus, a stake, point, style: see *style*¹.] In zool.: (a) Having a style or stylet; styletiferous. (b) Pen-like or peg-like; styloid; styloform.

style² (sti'lāt), a. [< NL. stylatus*, < stylus, a style (of a flower), < Gr. στίλος, a pillar: see *style*².] In bot., having a persistent style. Lindley.

style¹ (stil), n. [Formerly also, and prop., stīle; also in def. 1, as L. stylus, prop. stilus; < OF. style, stīle, F. style = Sp. estilo = It. stilo. < L. stilus, in ML. also, improp. stylus, a stake, pale, a pointed instrument used about plants, the stem or stalk of a plant, and esp. for scribing on a waxen tablet, hence writing, manner of writing, mode of expression in writing or speech, style; perhaps earlier with long vowel, stilus, for orig. stilgus*, < √ stig in stingere = Gr. στίλναι, pierce, stick, puncture (see *stick*¹, stigma); otherwise akin to OHG. stih, G. stiel, a handle, etc., AS. stæl, stiel, E. stale, steal, a handle: see *stale*². The word is prop. written stīle; the spelling style is in simulation of the Gr. στίλος, a pillar, which is not connected (see *style*²).] 1. An iron instrument, in the form of a bodkin tapering to a point at one end, used, in one of the methods of writing practised in ancient and medieval times, for scratching the letters into a waxed tablet, the other end being blunt for rubbing out writing and smoothing the tablet; figuratively, any writing-instrument.

But this my style no living man shall touch,
If first I be not forced by base reproach;
But like a sheathed sword it shall defend
My innocent life. B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Some wrought in Silks, some writ in tender Barks;

Some the sharp Stile in waxen Tables marks.

Cowley, Davideis, i.

2. Something similar in form to the instrument above described, or in some respect suggestive of it. (a) A pointed or needle-like tool, implement, or attachment, as the marking-point in the telegraph or phonograph, a craver, or an etching-needle. (b) In zool. and anat., a small, slender, pointed process or part; a styloid or styloform part or organ; a stylet; of spongespicules, a stylus. Specifically, in entom.: (1) Same as stylet, 3. (2) The bristle or seta of the antenna of a dipter; a stylus. See cuts under Gordius and Rhynchocera.

3. Mode of expression in writing or speaking; characteristic diction; a particular method of expressing thought by selection or collocation of words, distinct in some respect from other methods, as determined by nationality, period, literary form, individuality, etc.; in an absolute sense, appropriate or suitable diction; conformity to an approved literary standard: as, the style of Shakspeare or of Dickens; antiquated or modern style; didactic, poetic, or forensic stylistically (sti-lis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a stylistic relation; with respect to style. Classical Rev., III, 87.

Stylaster in its young state.

stylite (sti'līt), n. [L. Gr. στύλις, of or pertaining to a pillar, a pillar-saint, < στύλος, a pillar: see style.] In eccl. hist., one of a class of solitary ascetics who passed the greater part of their lives unsheltered on the top of high columns or pillars. This mode of mortification was practised among the monks of the East from the fifth to the eleventh century. The most celebrated was St. Simeon the Stylite, who lived in the fifth century. Also called pillar-saint.

stylobate (sti'lō-bāt), n. [= F. stylobate, < Gr. στύλοβατης, the base of a pillar, < στύλος, a pillar, + βαίνειν, go, advance.] In arch., a continuous basement upon which columns are placed to raise them above the level of the ground or a floor; particularly, the uppermost step of the stereobate of a columnar building, upon which rests an entire range of columns. It is distinguished from a pedestal, which, when it occurs in this use, supports only a single column. See cuts under base and stereobate.

stylocerite (sti-lōs'e-rit), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument (see style), + Gr. κέρα, horn, + -ite.] A style or spine on the outer side of the first joint of the antennule of some crustaceans. C. Spencer Bat.

styloglossal (sti-lō-glos'al), a. and n. [Styloglossus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the styloid process and the tongue.

II. n. The styloglossus.

styloglossus (sti-lō-glos'us), n.; pl. styloglossi (-i). [NL., < E. stylo (id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A slender muscle arising from the styloid process and inserted into the side of the tongue.

stylogonidium (sti'lō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. stylogonidia (-i). [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument (see style), + NL. gonidium, q. v.] In bot., a gonidium formed by abstriction on the ends of special filaments. Phillips, Brit. Discomycetes.

stylograph (sti'lō-grāf), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see style), + Gr. γράφειν, write.] A stylographic pen. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXVI, 68.

stylographic (sti-lō-grāf'ik), a. [As stylography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stylography or a stylograph; characterized by or adapted to the use of a style: as, stylographic cards; a stylographic pencil; stylographic ink. Stylographic pen. See pen.

stylographical (sti-lō-grāf'i-kal), a. [Stylographic + -al.] Same as stylographic.

stylographically (sti-lō-grāf'i-kal-i), adv. In a stylographic manner; by means of a style for writing or engraving.

stylography (sti-log'ra-fi), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see style), + Gr. γράφειν, write.] The art of tracing or the act of writing with a style; specifically, a method of drawing and engraving with a style on cards or tablets.

stylohyal (sti-lō-hi'al), n. [Stylo (id) + hyoid + -al.] In zool. and anat., one of the bones of the hyoid arch, near the proximal extremity of that arch, being or representing an infrastapedial element. In some vertebrates below mammals it is a part or division of the columellar stapes; in mammals it is the first bone of the hyoid arch outside of the ear; in man it is normally ankylosed with the temporal bone, constituting the styloid process of that bone, and is innervated only by a ligament (the stylohyoid ligament: see epihyal) with the lesser cornu of the hyoid. See stylohyoid, and cuts under Petrungzon, skull, and hyoid.

stylohyoid (sti-lō-hi'oid), a. and n. [Stylo (id) + hyoid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the stylohyal, or styloid process of the temporal bone, and the hyoid bone.—Stylohyoid ligament. See epihyal and ligament, and cut under skull. Stylohyoid muscle, a slender muscle extending from the styloid process of the temporal bone to the hyoid bone; the stylohyoid. See II.—Stylohyoid nerve, that branch of the facial nerve which goes to the stylohyoid muscle.

II. n. The stylohyoid muscle. See cuts under skull and muscle.

stylohyoidean (sti'lō-hi-oi'dē-an), a. [Stylohyoid + -ean.] Same as stylohyoid.

stylohyoideus (sti'lō-hi-oi'dē-us), n.; pl. stylohyoidei (-i). [NL.: see stylohyoid.] The stylohyoid muscle. See stylohyoid.

styloid (sti'lōid), a. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see style), + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Having some resemblance to a style or pen; like or likened to a style; styliform or stylate: an anatomical term applied to several processes of bone, generally slenderer than those called spines or spinous processes.—Styloid cornua, the epiphysals; the lesser cornua of the hyoid bone: so called because of their attachment to the stylohyoid ligament.—Styloid process. See process and cuts under skull and forearm.

stylolite (sti'lō-lit), n. [Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + λίθος, stone.] A peculiar form of jointed or columnar structure occasionally seen in beds of limestone, uniting the adjoining surfaces of two layers of the rock, and usually from half an inch to 3 or 4 inches in length. Stylolites were at first considered to be fossil corals, and called lignolites, and later epsomites, it being supposed that they had been formed by the crystallization of sulphate of magnesia. Stylolite is the name now most generally adopted for them, and it is believed that they are due to pressure of the superincumbent rock, which the stylolite has been able to resist to a certain extent because protected by a shell, or some other organic body, which would not admit of the sinking of the material immediately under it as rapidly as did the adjacent rock under the compression of the overlying material, the part thus protected forming a columnar individual mass with slightly striated surface.

stylomastoid (sti-lō-mas'toid), a. [Stylo (id) + mastoid.] In anat., common to the styloid process and the mastoid division of the temporal bone.—Stylomastoid artery, a branch of the posterior auricular artery, which enters the stylomastoid foramen to supply parts of the inner ear.—Stylomastoid foramen. See foramen, and cuts under Felidae and skull.—Stylomastoid vein, a small vein emptying into the posterior auricular vein.

stylomaxillary (sti-lō-mak'si-lā-ri), a. [Stylo (id) + maxillary.] Of or pertaining to the styloid process of the temporal bone and the inframaxillary, or lower jaw-bone.—Stylomaxillary ligament, a thin band of ligamentous fibers passing from near the tip of the styloid process to the angle and posterior border of the ramus of the mandible.

stylometer (sti-lom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. στύλος, pillar, column, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring columns.

Stylommatophora (sti-lō-ma-tof'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stylommatophorus: see stylommatophorous.] A suborder or other prime division of pulmonate gastropods, having the eyes borne on the ends of the tentacles: opposed to Basommatophora. It includes the terrestrial pulmonates, as land-snails and slugs. Geophila and Nephropneusta are synonyms.

stylommatophorous (sti-lō-ma-tof'ō-rus), a. [NL. stylommatophorus, < Gr. στύλος, a pillar, + ὄμμα (τ), an eye, + -όρος, < φέρειν = E. bear.] Having eyes at the top of a style, horn, or tentacle, as a snail; of or pertaining to the Stylommatophora.

stylomatous (sti-lō-m'a-tus), a. [Gr. στύλος, a pillar, + ὄμμα (τ), an eye.] Same as stylommatophorous.

stylopharyngeal (sti-lō-fā-rin'jē-al), a. and n. [Stylopharyngeus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the styloid process and the pharynx.

II. n. The stylopharyngeus.

stylopharyngeus (sti'lō-fā-rin-jē'us), n.; pl. stylopharynges (-i). [NL., < L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style, + Gr. φάρυγξ (φάρυγξ), the throat.] A long slender muscle, spreading out below, arising from the base of the styloid process of the temporal bone, and inserted partly into the constrictor muscles of the pharynx, and partly into the posterior border of the thyroid cartilage: it is innervated by the glossopharyngeus.

Stylophorum (sti-lof'ō-rum), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), so called from the conspicuous style; < Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + φέρειν = E. bear.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Papaveraceae and tribe Papavereae. It is characterized by flowers with two sepals, four petals, and a distinct style with the placentae after the fall of the valves and serotinate seeds from the ovoid, oblong, or linear, and commonly stalked capsule. There are 4 or 5 species, 2 in North America, the others in the Himalayas, Manchuria, and Japan. They are herbs with a perennial rootstock and a yellow juice, bearing a few lobed or dissected tender stem-leaves, and usually others which are pinnatifid and radical. The yellow or red flowers are borne on long peduncles which are nodding in the bud. S. diphyllum is the celandine poppy or yellow poppy of the central United States, formerly classed under Mecopopsis. Its light-green leaves resemble those of the celandine, and, like it, contain a yellow juice.

Stylopidæ (sti-lōp'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Kirby, 1813), < Stylops + -idæ.] An aberrant group of insects, formerly considered as forming a distinct order, Strepsiptera or Rhipiptera, but now ranked as a family of heteromerous beetles, typified by the anomalous genus Stylops. In the males, which are capable of flight, the mouth-parts are atrophied, except the mandibles and one pair of palpi; the prothorax and mesothorax are very short; the elytra are reduced to simple club-shaped appendages (pseudelytra), while the hind wings are well developed, the metathorax being remarkably large and long, and the abdomen small. The females are wingless and worm-like, with a flattened triangular head, and live in the abdomen of certain bees and wasps, though the members of some exotic genera parasitize ants and some homopterous and orthopterous insects. They are viviparous, giving birth to hundreds of minute young, of very primitive form, with bulbous feet, slender hairy body ending in two long styles, and intestine ending as a closed sac. Stylops and Xenus are the only genera represented in North America. S.

children lives in certain bees, and X. pecki in a common wasp (Polistes metricus). See cut under Stylops.

stylized (sti'lō-pizd), a. [Stylos + -ize + -ed.] Penetrated by a stylops; serving as the host of the parasitic stylops.

stylopod (sti'lō-pod), n. [NL. stylopodium, < Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + ποδ (pod-) = E. foot.] In bot., same as stylopodium.

stylopodium (sti-lō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. stylopodia (-i). [NL.: see stylopod.] In bot., one of the double fleshy disks from which the styles in the Umbelliferae arise.

Stylops (sti'lōps), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1802), < Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + ὤψ, eye, face.] 1. A genus of insects, type of the order Rhipiptera.

1. Stylops truncatus, adult female, with two nearly hatched eggs. C. D., in E. the abdomen. A., ventral surface of thorax of three segments, 1, 2, 3; B., mandibles; C., mouth. 2. Stylops truncatus, newly born larva, on a hair of a bee (Chalcidius truncatus). (All highly magnified.)

tera or Strepsiptera, and now of the coleopterous family Stylopidae.—2. [I. c.] An insect of this genus; a rhipipter or strepsipter.

Stylosanthes (sti-lō-san'thēz), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1788), so called from the stalk-like calyx-tube; irreg. < Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + άνθος, flower.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Hedysareae, type of the subtribe Stylosantheae. It is characterized by pinnate leaves of three leaflets, and an oblong or globose and usually densely flowered spike, a long stalk-like calyx-tube, and stamens united into a closed tube with their anthers alternately oblong and basifixed and shorter and versatile. There are about 21 species, of which 4 are natives of Africa or Asia, 1 is North American, and the others are South American and mainly Brazilian. They are commonly viscous herbs with yellow flowers in dense terminal spikes or heads, rarely scattered or axillary. S. elatior of the United States, the pencil-flower of southern pine-barrens, extends north to Long Island and Indiana. S. procumbens is known in the West Indies as trefoil.

stylospore (sti'lō-spōr), n. [Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + σπορά, seed: see spore.] In bot., a stalked spore, developed by abstriction from the top of a slender thread or sterigma, and produced either in a special receptacle, as a pycnidium, or uninclosed as in the Coniomycetes. See pycnidium, macrostylospore. Also called pycnidiospore, pycnosporidium, pycnospore.

stylosporous (sti-lōs'pō-rus), a. [Stylospore + -ous.] In bot., of the nature of a stylospore; resembling a stylospore.

stylostegium (sti-lō-stē'ji-um), n.; pl. stylostegia (-i). [NL., < Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + στέγος, cover.] In bot., the peculiar orbicular corona which covers the style in Stapelia and similar asclepiads.

stylostemon (sti-lō-stē'mon), n. [NL., < Gr. στύλος, a pillar, + στέμων, taken as 'stamen' (see stamen).] In bot., an epigynous stamen.

stylotypite (sti'lō-ti-pit), n. [Gr. στύλος, a pillar (see style), + τύπος, impression, + -ite.] A sulphid of antimony, copper, iron, and silver, from Copiapo, Chili: it is closely related to Stylis.

stylus (stī'lus), n.; pl. styli (-li). [NL., < L. stylus, a pointed instrument: see style.] 1. A sponge-spicule of the monaxon uniradiate type, sharp at one end and not at the other. It is regarded as an axon, one of whose rays is suppressed.—2. In entom., a style or stylet.

styme, a. See styme.
stymie (stī'mi), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps connected with styme, styme, a glimpse, a transitory glance.] In golf-playing, a position in which a player has to putt for the hole with his opponent's ball directly in the line of his approach.

Stymphalian (stim-fa'li-an), a. [< L. Stymphaleus, < Gr. Στυμφαλίος, Stymphalos (see def.).] Of or pertaining to Stymphalus (the ancient name of a small deep valley, a lake, a river, and a town in Arcadia, Greece).
Stymphalian birds, in Gr. fable, a flock of noisy, voracious, and destructive birds, with brazen or iron claws, wings, and beaks, which infested Stymphalus. The killing or expulsion of these birds was the sixth labor of Hercules.

A sort of dangerous fowl (critics), who have a perverse inclination to plunder the best branches of the tree of knowledge, like those Stymphalian birds that eat up the fruit.
Swift, Tale of a Tub, iii.

styptic (stip'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also stiptic, < ME. stiptik, < OF. (and F.) stiptic = Sp. estiptico = Pg. estitico = It. stilitico, < L. stipticus, < Gr. στειτικός, astringent, < στειν, contract, draw together, be astringent.] 1. a. 1. Astringent; constrictive; binding.

Take heed that slippery meats be not fyrste eaten, nor that stiptik nor restraining meates be taken at the begynning, as quynces, peares, and medlars.
Sir T. Elyot, Castle of Health, fol. 45.

2. Having the quality of checking hemorrhage or bleeding; stanching.

Then in his hands a bitter root he bruis'd;
The wound he wash'd, the styptic juice infus'd.
Pope, Iliad, xi. 933.

Styptic colloidion, a compound of colloidion 100 parts, carbolic acid 10 parts, pure tannin 5 parts, and benzoic acid 3 parts. Also called styptic colloid.—Styptic powder.

II. n. 1. An astringent; something causing constriction or constraint.

Mankind is infinitely beholden to this noble styptic, that could produce such wonderful effects so suddenly.
Steele, Lying Lover, v. 1.

2. A substance employed to check a flow of blood by application to the bleeding orifice or surface.

This wyne alle medecyne is take unto Ther stiptik stont [stop] ejecting bloode, and wo
Of wombe or of stomak this wol decele.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 102.

Cotton-wool styptic, cotton-wool soaked in tincture of perchloric acid.

styptical (stip'ti-kal), a. [< styptic + -al.] Same as styptic.

styptic-bur (stip'tik-bér), n. See Priva.
stypticite (stip'ti-sit), n. [< styptic + -ite.] Same as fibroferrite.

stypticity (stip-tis'i-ti), n. [< styptic + -ity.] The property of being styptic; astringency.

Catharticks of mercurials precipitate the viscidities by their stypticity, and mix with all animal acids.
Sir J. Floyer.

styptic-weed (stip'tik-wéd), n. The western cussia, Cassia occidentalis, a tall herb of tropical America and the southern United States. Its seeds from their use, are called negro or Mogdad coffee, though they do not contain caffeine; its root is said to be diuretic; and its leaves are used as a dressing for slight wounds (whence the name). Also stinking-weed, stinking-weed.

Styracaceæ (stī-rā-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Alphonse de Candolle, 1844), < Styrax (-ac-) + -acæ.] Same as Styracæ.

Styracæ (stī-rā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Richard, 1808), for Styracaceæ; < Styrax + -acæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Ethnales. It is characterized by flowers which usually have ten or more stamens attached to a five-lobed corolla, and an ovary which is inferior, half inferior, or fixed by a broad base, and contains a solitary ovule or few in each cell. The embryo, with its doubtful radicle, also differs from most of the other orders. The Sapindæ and Ethnales in which it is respectively inferior and superior. The order includes about 235 species, belonging to 7 genera, of which only Hales is found in North America and Asia, and Styrax in the Americas, and the others belong to the Styracæ, Swabian, or to the type Styrax, natives of the Americas, and extending to Africa. They are smooth, seriate membranous or coriaceous feather-veined leaves. Their flowers are usually white, and are arranged singly or in racemes. (Quercus of Lancelotti. See Hales, Styrax, Swabian.)

styracin, styracine (stī-rā-sin), n. [< NL. Styracis (-ac-) + -in, -ine.] An ester (C₁₈H₁₆O₂) of cinnamic acid, which is the chief constituent of storax. It forms odorless and tasteless crystals, which have the properties of a resin.

Styrax (stī'raks), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so named because producing a gum; < L. styrax, storax, < Gr. στρυγξ, the gum storax, also the tree producing it: see storax.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, type of the order Styracæ. It is characterized by flowers with five partly united or separate petals, ten stamens in one row with linear or rarely oblong anthers, and a three-celled or afterward one-celled ovary with the ovules usually few and erect or pendulous. The fruit is seated upon the calyx and is globose or oblong, dry or drupaceous, indehiscent or three-valved, and nearly filled by the usually solitary seed. There are over 60 species, widely scattered through warm regions of Asia and America, a few also natives of temperate parts of Asia and southern Europe, but none found in Africa or Australia. They are shrubs or trees, usually scurvy or covered with stellate hairs, and bearing entire or slightly serrate leaves, and usually white flowers in pendulous racemes. Several species are cultivated for ornament; S. japonica, recently introduced into gardens, is known from its feathery white blossoms as snowflake-flower. Others yield valuable gums, especially S. Benzoin (see benzoin), and S. officinalis (see storax). S. punctata, a Central American tree, yields a gum which is used as frankincense, and is obtained on removing the external wood from trees which have been cut for several years. S. grandifolia, S. Americana, and S. pulverulenta, known as American storax, occur in the United States from Virginia southward, with one species in Texas and one in California.

Styrian (stī'rī-an), a. and n. [< Styria (see def.) + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to (Styria, a crownland and duchy of the Austrian empire, lying south of Upper and Lower Austria, and west of Hungary).

II. n. One of the people of Styria.
styrol (stī'rol), n. [< L. styr(ax) + -ol.] A colorless strongly refractive liquid (C₈H₈), with an odor like that of benzoin, obtained by heating styracin with calcium hydrate. Also called cinnamene.

styrolene (stī'rō-lēn), n. [< styr(ax) + -ene.] Same as styrol.

styrone (stī'rōn), n. [< styr(ax) + -one.] Cinnamyl alcohol (C₉H₁₀O), a crystalline solid with a fragrant odor, obtained by treating styracin with caustic potash. It is slightly soluble in water, and volatile at high temperatures.

stythe¹, n. [An irreg. var. of stythe.] A sty.
O out of my stythe I [a maiden transformed to a beast] winna rise . . .
Till Kempion, the Kingis son,
Cum to the crag, and thrice kiss me.
Kempion (Child's Ballads, I. 140).

And, at last, into the very swine's stythe,
The Queen brought forth a son.
Queen Footrage (Child's Ballads, III. 43).

stythe² (stith), n. [More prop. stith; cf. E. dial. stith, stifling; prob. a var. of stive, after stith, stith, strong; see stith.] Choke-damp; after-damp; black-damp; the mixture of gases left after an explosion of fire-damp, and consisting chiefly of carbonic-acid gas; also, more rarely, this gas accumulated in perceptible quantity in any part of a coal-mine, whether arising from respiration of men or animals, from the use of gunpowder, or from the burning of lamps or candles. [Lancashire, Eng.,

Shallow and badly ventilated mines produce stythe.
Gresley.

styward¹, n. A Middle English form of steward.

Styx (stiks), n. [< L. Styx, < Gr. Στύξ (Sty-), a river of the infernal regions, lit. 'the Hateful,' < στύγιος, hate, abominate.] 1. In Gr. myth., a river of the lower world.—2. [NL.] In zool., a genus of butterflies, of the subfamily Pierinæ. Staudinger, 1876.

Swabian, a. and n. Same as Swabian.

suability (sū-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< suable + -ity.] Liability to be sued; the state of being suable, or subject by law to civil process.

suable (sū-a-bl), a. [< *sua*¹ + -abl.] Capable of being or liable to be sued; subject by law to civil process.

suadet (swādē), v. t. [< OF. suader = Sp. suadir = It. suadere, < L. suadere, advise, urge, persuade: see suasion, and cf. dissuade, persuade.] To persuade.

suadible (swā'di-bl), a. [< suade + -ible.] Same as suasible.

Suæda (sū-ē'dā), n. [NL. (Forskål, 1775), from an Ar. name.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and series Spiroloboæ, type of the tribe Suædæ. It is characterized by fleshy linear leaves, and flowers with a five-lobed persistent perianth from which the inclosed utricle is nearly or quite free. There are about 45 species, natives of seashores and salt deserts. They are erect or prostrate herbs or shrubs, green or glaucous, and either simple or diffusely branched. Their leaves are usually terete and entire, and their flowers small and nearly or quite sessile in the axils. S. linearis is a small sea-coast plant of the Atlantic coast from Nova Scotia to Florida; 6 or 7 other species occur westward. S. fruticosa, known as sea-rosemery, shrubby goosefoot, or white glasswort, an erect branching evergreen common in the Mediterranean region, is one of the plants formerly burned to produce barilla. For S. maritima, also called sea-goosefoot, see sea-blite, under blite.

Suædæ (sū-ē'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Moquin, 1852), < Suæda + -æ.] A tribe of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and suborder Chenopodiaceæ. It is characterized by an unjointed stem with mostly linear, terete, or ovate leaves, and by its fruit, a utricle included in the unchanged or appendaged perianth, the seed-coat crustaceous or finally membranous, and the embryo spiral. It includes five genera, four monotypic and occurring in saline regions in Persia and central Asia; for the other, the type, see Suæda.

suaget, swaget (swāj), v. [< ME. swagen; by aphesis from assuage.] 1. trans. To make quiet; soothe; assuage.

Fayne were tho freikes and the folke all,
And swiftly thai swere, swagit their hertes,
To be lill to the lord all his lyf tyme.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 13643.

Sir R. Gylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 73.

suant¹ (sū'ant), a. [Also suent, formerly sewant, sewant; < OF. suant, ppr. of suivre, etc., follow: see sue, sequent.] 1. Following; sequent; pursuant. Halliwel (undersuent).—2. Smooth; even.

The Middlesex Cattle Show goes off here with éclat annually, as if all the joints of the agricultural machine were event.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 37.

[Prov. Eng. and New Eng. in both senses.]

suant² (sū'ant), n. [Formerly also sewant; origin uncertain.] The plaiice. Halliwel (under sewant). [Prov. Eng.]

Behold some others ranged all along
To take the sewant, yea, the flounder sweet.
J. Denys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 171).

The shad that in the springtime cometh in;
The suant swift, that is not set by least.
J. Denys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 175).

suantly (sū'ant-li), adv. Evenly; smoothly; regularly. Also suently. [Prov. New Eng.]

suarrow (sū-ar'ō), n. A variant of souari.

suasible (swā'si-bl), a. [= Sp. suasible = It. suasibile, < L. suadere, pp. suasus, advise, urge: see suade, suasion. (cf. suadible.] Same as persuasible. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

suasion (swā'zhon), n. [< ME. suacyon, < OF. suasion = It. suasione, < L. suasio (-n-), an advising, a counseling, exhortation, < suadere, pp. suasus, advise, counsel, urge, persuade (cf. LL. suadus, persuasive, L. Suada, the goddess of persuasion), < suavis, orig. suadvis*, pleasant, sweet: see suave, sweet.] The act or effort of persuading; the use of persuasive means or efforts: now chiefly in the phrase moral suasion.

The suacyon of swetenesse rethoryen.
Chaucer, Boethius, ii. prose 1.

Thei had, by the subtil suasion of the deuill, broken the thirde commandement in tasting the forbidden fruite.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 157.

She did not dare to come down the path to shake her, and moral suasion at the distance of sixty or seventy feet is very ineffective. T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 184.

suasive (swā'siv), a. [< OF. suasif = Sp. It. suasivo, < L. suadere, pp. suasus, advise, urge: see suade, suasion.] Having power to persuade; persuasive. [Archaic and poetical.]

Its [justice's] command over them was but suasive and political.
South, Sermons, I. ii.

suasively (swā'siv-lī), adv. So as to persuade.
Let a true tale . . . be suasively told them.
Carlyle, French Rev., I. iii. 2.

Styrax Benzoin. a, a flower.

suasory (swā'sō-rī), a. [= OF. suasore = Sp. Pg. It. suasorio, < L. suasorius, of or pertaining to advice or persuasion, < suasor, one who advises or persuades, < suadere, advise, persuade: see suath, suasion.] Tending to persuade; persuasive.

A Suasory or Enticing Temptation.

Bp. Hopkins, Expos. of the Lord's Prayer, Works, I. 140.

suave (swāv or swäv), a. [F. suave = Sp. Pg. suave = It. suave, < L. suavis, orig. suaviter = Gr. hēle, sweet, agreeable, = AS. suete, F. suet: see sweet. Cf. suath, suasion, etc.] Soothingly agreeable; pleasant; mollifying; bland: used of persons or things: as, a suave diplomatist; suave politeness.

Mr. Hall, . . . to whom the husky oat-cake was, from custom, suavia as manna, seemed in his best spirits.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvi.

What gentle, suave, courteous tones!

Mrs. H. Jackson, Ramona, I.

suavely (swāv' or swäv'li), adv. In a suave or soothing manner; blandly: as, to speak suavely.

suaviloquent (swā-vil'ō-kwent), a. [L. suaviloquent (t)-s, speaking sweetly, < L. suavis, sweet, & loquens (t)-s, ppr. of loqui, speak.] Speaking suave or blandly; using soothing or agreeable speech. Bailey, 1727.

suaviloquy (swā-vil'ō-kwi), n. [L. suaviloquium, sweet speaking, < L. suaviloquus, speaking sweetly, < suavis, sweet, & loqui, speak.] Sweetness of speech. Compare suaviloquent.

suavity (swāv'i-ti), n. [F. suavité = Sp. suavidad = Pg. suavidade = It. suavità, suavità, < L. suavitas (t)-s, sweetness, pleasantness, < suavis, sweet, pleasant: see suave.] 1. Pleasant or soothing quality or manner; agreeableness; blandness: as, suavity of manner or address.

Our own people . . . greatly lack suavity, and show a comparative inattention to minor civilities.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 431.

The worst that can be said of it [Perugino's style] is that its suavity inclines to mawkishness, and that its quietism borders upon sleepiness.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 75.

Hence—2. Pl. suavities (-tiz). That which is suave, bland, or soothing.

The elegances and suavities of life die out one by one as we sink through the social scale.

O. W. Holmes, Professor, vi.

3†. Sweetness to the senses; a mild or agreeable quality. Johnson.

She [Rachel] desired them [the mandrakes] for rarity, pulchritude, or suavity. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 7.

=Syn. 1. Urbanity, amenity, civility, courtesy.

sub- [ME. sub- = OF. sub-, sou-, F. sub-, sou- = Fr. sub- = Sp. Pg. It. sub-, < L. sub, prep. with abl., under, before, near; of time, toward, up to, just after; in comp., under (of place), secretly (of action); the b remains in comp. unchanged, except before c, f, g, p, where it is usually, and before m and r, where it is often assimilated (suc-, suf-, sug-, sup-, sum-, sur-); also in another form subs, in comp. sub-, as in suscipere, undertake, sustinere, sustain, etc., reduced to sub- before a radical s, as in suscipere, look under, inspire, inspire; prob. = Gr. hypo, under (see hypo-), with initial s as in super = Gr. hyper (see super-, hyper-): see up and over. Cf. subter-.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning 'under, below, beneath,' or 'from under.' (a) It occurs in its literal sense in many words, verbs, adjectives, and nouns, taken from the Latin, as in subagent, underlying, subscribe, underwrite, subside, sit down, submerge, plunge down, etc., the literal sense being in many cases not felt in English, as in subject, subjoin, subtract, etc. (b) It also expresses an inferior or subordinate part or degree, as in subdivide, especially with adjectives, where it is equivalent to the English -ish, meaning 'somewhat, rather,' as in subacid, sourish, subdulcid, sweetish, etc., being in these greatly extended in modern use, as an accepted English formative, applicable not only to adjectives of Latin origin, especially in scientific use, as in subalate, subordinate, subdivine, etc., but to words of other origin, as subhornblendic. (c) It is also freely used with nouns denoting an agent or a division, to denote an inferior or subordinate agent or division, as in subdeacon, subprior, subgenus, subspecies, etc., not only with Latin but with nouns of other origin, as in subreader, submarshal, subfreshman, etc., where it is equivalent to under- or deputy, and is usually written with a hyphen. (d) In many cases, especially where it has been assimilated, as in suc-, suf-, sug-, sup-, sum-, sur-, the force of the prefix is not felt in English, and the word is to English apprehension a primitive, as in sucor, suffer, suggest, support, summon, surrender, etc. In technical use sub- denotes—(e) In zool. and anat.: (1) Inferiority in kind, quality, character, degree, extent, and the like. It is prefixed almost at will to adjectives admitting of comparison, and in its various applications may be rendered by 'less than, not quite, not exactly, somewhat, nearly, hardly, almost,' etc.: it often has the diminishing or depreciating force of the suffix -ish; it is sometimes prefixed, like about, merely to avoid committal to more precise or exact statement, but in a few cases implies unlikelihood amounting to opposition, and so to negation of some character or attribute, with the meaning nearly of quasi or pseudo. A particular case indicates taxonomic inferiority, or subordination in classificatory grade, of any group from subkingdom to subvariety: it is the sense (c) above noted, and the same as the botanical sense (2) below. (2) Inferiority in place or position; lowness of relative location. This sense is more definite, and the meaning of 'lower than' may usually be rendered by 'under, underneath, beneath, below,' sometimes by 'on the under side of.' This sub- is synonymous with infra- or infero-, and with hypo-, and is the opposite of supra- or super-, hyper-, and sometimes epi-. (f) In bot., (1) with adjectives, literal position beneath, as in subcortical, subhymental, subepidermal, subpetiolar, etc., (2) with classificatory terms, a systematic grade next lower than that of the stem-word, as in suborder, subgenus, subspecies; (3) with adjectives and adverbs, an inferior degree or extent, 'somewhat, to some extent, imperfectly,' as in subangulose, subascending, subcaudate, subcanulate, etc. (g) In chem., the fact that the member of the compound with which it is connected is in relative minimum: thus, subacetate of lead is a compound of lead and acetic acid which is capable of combining with more acetic acid radicals, but not with more lead. [As sub- in most of the uses noted above is now established as an English formative, it is to be treated, like under- in similar cases, as applicable in modern use in any instance where it may be wanted; and of the modern compounds so formed only the principal ones are entered below, usually without further etymological note. Many of the adjectives have two meanings, the mode of formation differing accordingly: thus, subabdominal, 'situated under the abdomen,' is formed L. sub, under, + abdomen (abdomin-), abdomen, + -al; while subabdominal, 'not quite abdominal,' is < sub- + abdominal. For the full etymology of these words, when not given below, see sub- and the other member of the compound. The less familiar compounds with sub- are often written with a hyphen; it is here uniformly omitted.]

sub (sub), n. [Contr. of subaltern or subordinate.] A subaltern; a subordinate. [Colloq.]

"Ah, when we were subs together in camp in 1803, what a lively fellow Charley Baynes was!" his comrade, Colonel Bunch, would say. Thackeray, Philip, xxvi.

suba, n. See subah.

subabdominal (sub-ab-dom'i-nal), a. [= F. subabdominal; as sub- + abdominal.] 1. Situated below or beneath the abdomen: as, the subabdominal appendages of a crustacean.—2. Not quite abdominal in position, as the ventral fins of a fish.

subacetate (sub-as'e-tāt), n. A basic acetate—that is, one in which there are one or more equivalents of the basic radical which may combine with the acid anhydrid to form a normal acetate: as, subacetate of lead; subacetate of copper (verdigris).

subacid (sub-as'id), a. and n. [= Sp. subácido = It. subacido, < L. subacidus, somewhat sour, < sub, under, + acidus, sour: see acid.] I. a. 1. Moderately acid or sour: as, a subacid juice. Arbuthnot.—2. Hence, noting words or a temperament verging on acidity or somewhat biting.

A little subacid kind of drollish impatience in his nature. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, viii. 26.

II. n. A substance moderately acid.

subacidity (sub-a-sid'i-ti), n. The state of being subacid; also, that which is slightly acid or acid.

A theologic subacidity. The Atlantic, LXVII. 411.

subacidulous (sub-a-sid'ū-lus), a. Moderately acidulous.

Tasting a thimbleful of rich Canary, honeyed Cyprus, or subacidulous Hock. Lovell, Study Windows, p. 291.

subacrid (sub-ak'rid), a. Moderately acrid, sharp, or pungent. Sir J. Floyer.

subacromial (sub-a-kro'mi-al), a. [L. sub, under, + NL acromion: see acromial.] Situated below the acromion: as, a subacromial bursa.

subact (sub-akt'), v. t. [L. subactus, pp. of subigere, bring under, subdue, < sub, under, + agere, lead, bring: see act.] To reduce; subdue; subject. Ecelyn, True Religion, II. 375.

subact (sub-akt'), a. [ME., < L. subactus, pp.: see the verb.] Reduced; subdued.

In Novemb'r and Marche her branches sette

In douned lande subact.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 122.

subaction (sub-ak'shon), n. [L. subactio (n)-, a working through or up, preparation: see sub-act.] 1. The act of reducing, or the state of being reduced; reduction. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 838.—2. A substance reduced.

subacuminate (sub-a-kū'mi-nāt), a. Somewhat acuminate.

subacute (sub-a-kūt'), a. Noting a condition just below that of acuteness, in any sense.

subacutely (sub-a-kūt'li), adv. In a subacute manner.

subaërial (sub-ā-ē'ri-al), a. In geol. formed, produced, or deposited in the open air, and not beneath the sea, or under water, or below the surface; not submarine or subterranean: thus, subaërial denudation or erosion. See æolian, 2.

subagency (sub-ā'jen-si), n. A delegated agency.

subagent (sub-ā'jent), n. In law, the agent of an agent.

subah (sō'bā), n. [Also suba, soubah; < Pers. Hind. subah, a province.] 1. A division or province of the Mogul empire. Yule and Burnell.—2. An abbreviation of subahdar.

subahdar (sō-bā-dār'), n. [Also soubahdar, soubadar; < Pers. Hind. subahdār, < subah, a province, + -dār, holding, keeping.] 1. Originally, a lord of a subah or province; hence, a local commandant or chief officer.—2. The chief native officer of a company of sepoys. Yule and Burnell.

subaid (sub-ād'), v. t. To give secret or private aid to. Daniel. [Rare.]

subalmoner (sub-al'mon-ēr), n. A subordinate almoner. Wood.

subalpine (sub-al'pin), a. [= F. subalpin = Pg. subalpino, < L. subalpinus, lying near the Alps, < sub, under, + Alpinus, Alpine: see alpine.] 1. Living or growing on mountains at an elevation next below the height called alpine.—2. Lower Alpine: applied to that part or zone of the Alps which lies between the so-called "highland" zone and the "Alpine" zone proper. It extends between the elevations of 4,000 and 5,500 feet approximately, and is especially characterized by the presence of coniferous trees, chiefly firs, which cover a large part of its surface. Large timber-trees rarely reach much above its upper border. Below the subalpine zone is the highland or mountain zone, the region of deciduous trees, and above it the Alpine, which, as this term is generally used, embraces the region extending between the upper limit of trees and the first appearance of permanent snow. Still higher up is the glacial region, comprehending all that part of the Alps which rises above the limit of perpetual snow. The terms alpine and subalpine are sometimes applied to other mountain-chains than the Alps, with signification more or less vaguely accordant with their application to that chain.

subaltern (sub'al-térn or su-bál'térn, the former always in the logical sense), a. and n. [F. subalterne = Sp. Pg. It. subalterno, < ML. subalternus, subaltern, < L. sub, under, + alternus, one after the other, alternate: see altern.] I. a. Having an inferior or subordinate position; subordinate; specifically (milit.), holding the rank of a junior officer usually below the rank of captain.

To this system of religion were tagged several subaltern doctrines. Swift, Tale of a Tub, ii.

Subaltern genus, opposition, proposition, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. A subaltern officer; a subordinate.

subalternant (sub-al-tér'nant), a. and n. [= Sp. It. subalternante, as subaltern + -ant.] I. a. In logic, universal, as opposed to particular.

II. n. A universal.

subalternate (sub-al-tér'nāt), a. and n. [< subaltern + -ate.] I. a. 1. Successive; succeeding by turns. Imp. Dict.—2. Subordinate; subaltern; inferior. Canon Tooker.

II. n. In logic, a particular, as opposed to a universal.

subalternating (sub-al-tér'nā-ting), a. Succeeding by turns; successive. Imp. Dict.

subalternation (sub-al-tér'nā-shon), n. [= Pg. subalternação; as subaltern + -ion.] 1. The state of inferiority or subjection; the state of being subalternate; succession by turns. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 73.—2. In logic, an immediate inference from a universal to a particular under it: as, every griffin breathes fire; therefore, some animals breathe fire. Some logicians do not admit the validity of this inference.

subanal (sub-ā'nal), a. [< L. sub, under, + anus, anus: see anal.] Situated under the anus: specifically noting a plate or other formation in echinoderms. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 644.

subancestral (sub-an-ses'tral), a. Of collateral ancestry or derivation; not in the direct line of descent. Proc. U. S. Nat. Mus., XI. 588.

subanconeal (sub-ang-kō-nē-āl), a. [< L. sub, under, + NL anconeus: see anconeal.] Situated underneath the anconeus.

subanconeus (sub-ang-kō-nē-us), n.; pl. subanconeii (-i). [NL., < L. sub, under, + NL anconeus, q. v.] A small muscle of the back of the elbow, arising from the humerus just above the olecranon fossa, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the elbow-joint. It resembles the subcrureus of the knee.

subandean (sub-an'dē-an), a. [< sub- + Andes: see Andean.] In zoogeog., subjacent with reference to certain parts of the Andes, and nowhere attaining an altitude so great as that subandean (sub-an'dē-an), a. Specifying the highest Andean mountains; specifying the sub-Andean zone. See below. Subandean subregion (sub-an'dē-an), n. One of the subregions into which the continent of South America (with the islands) has been divided by A. Newton. It is the northernmost of the five divisions of the continent, with the ranges of Páramo, Titiaká, and the Galapagos, and takes in all the South American countries that border the Amazonian, Brazilian, or Patagonian subregions. The subandean subregion includes what has also been called the Columbian (or Colombian), but is not to be confused with it. It is recognized upon ornithological grounds as well as to possess a peculiar genera of birds. Encyc. Brit., III, 744.

subangled (sub-an'g'ld), a. Same as subangulate. Subangled wave. See wave.

subangular (sub-an'g'u-lar), a. Slightly angular; bluntly angulated. Huxley, Physiography, p. 278.

subangulate, subangulated (sub-an'g'u-lāt, -lāt'), a. Somewhat angled or sharp.

subantichrist (sub-an'ti-krist), n. A person or power partially antagonistic to Christ; a lesser antichrist. Milton, Church-Government, i. 6. [Rare.]

subapennine (sub-ap'e-nin), a. [= F. subapennin, < L. sub, under, + Apenninus, Apennine; see Apennine.] Being at the base or foot of the Apennines. Subapennine series, in geol., a series of rocks of Pliocene age, developed in Italy on the flanks of the Apennines, and also in Sicily. In the Ligurian region the Pliocene has been divided into Messinian and Astian; in Sicily, into Astian, Plaisancian, and Zanclean. In the last region these rocks rise to an elevation of 4,000 feet above the sea-level, and are replete with well-preserved forms of organic life now living in the Mediterranean.

subapical (sub-ap'i-kal), a. [< L. sub, under, + apex, point; see apical.] Situated below the apex.

subaponeurotic (sub-ap'o-nē-rot'ik), a. [< L. sub, under, + NL aponeurosis; see aponeurotic.] Situated beneath an aponeurosis.

subapostolic (sub-ap-os-tol'ik), a. Of, pertaining to, or constituting the period succeeding that of the apostles; as, subapostolic literature. Encyc. Brit., XI, 854.

subappressed (sub-a-prest'), a. In entom., partly appressed; as, subappressed hairs.

subaquatic (sub-a-kwat'ik), a. 1. Not entirely aquatic, as a wading bird.—2. [= F. subaquatique.] Situated or formed in or below the surface of the water; subaqueous.

subaqueous (sub-ā'kwē-us), a. [= It. subaqueo; as L. sub, under, + E. aqueous.] Situated, formed, or living under water; subaquatic.

subarachnoid (sub-a-rak'noid), a. 1. Situated beneath the arachnoid—that is, between that membrane and the pia mater; as, the subarachnoid space.—2. Subdural.—Subarachnoid fluid, the cerebrospinal fluid.—Subarachnoid space, the space between the arachnoid membrane and the pia mater.

subarachnoidal, subarachnoidean (sub-ar-ak-noi'dal, -de-an), a. Same as subarachnoid. H. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1887), p. 653.

subarborescent (sub-ār-bō-res'ent), a. Having a somewhat tree-like aspect.

subarctic (sub-ārkt'ik), a. Nearly arctic; existing or occurring a little south of the arctic circle; as, a subarctic region or fauna; subarctic animals or plants; a subarctic climate.

subarcuate (sub-ār'kū-āt), a. Somewhat bent or bowed; slightly arcuated.

subarcuated (sub-ār'kū-āt-ed), a. Same as subarcuate.

subareolar (sub-a-rē'ō-lār), a. Situated beneath the mammary areola.—Subareolar abscess, a furuncular subcutaneous abscess of the areola of the nipple.

subarmor (sub-ār'mor), n. A piece of armor worn beneath the visible outer defense. J. Hewitt, Anc. Armour, II, 132.

subarrhatation (sub-a-rā'shon), n. [< ML. subarratio* (n-), < subarrare, betroth, < L. sub, under, + arrha, earnest-money, a pledge; see arrha.] The ancient custom or rite of betrothing by the bestowal, on the part of the man, of marriage gifts or tokens, as money, rings, or other objects, upon the woman. Also subarration.

The prayer which follows . . . takes the place of a long form of blessing which followed the subarrhatation in the ancient office.

Blund, Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 155.

subastragalar (sub-as-trag'ā-lār), a. Situated beneath the astragalus.—Subastragalar amputation, amputation of most of the foot, leaving only the astragalus.

subastragaloid (sub-as-trag'ā-loid), a. Situated beneath or below the astragalus.

subastral (sub-as'tral), a. [< L. sub, under, + astrum, a star; see astral.] Situated beneath the stars or heavens; terrestrial.

subaud (sub-ād'), r. t. [< L. subaudire, supply a word omitted, hear a little, < sub, under, + audire, hear; see audient.] To supply mentally, as a word or an ellipsis. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

subaudition (sub-ā-dish'on), n. [< L. subaudition (n-), the supplying of a word omitted, < subaudire, supply a word omitted; see subaud.] The act of understanding something not expressed; that which is understood or implied from that which is expressed; understood meaning. Horne Tooke.

subaural (sub-ā'ral), a. Situated beneath or below the ear.

subaxillar (sub-ak'si-lār), a. and n. Same as subaxillary.

subaxillary (sub-ak'si-lā-ri), a. and n. I. a. 1. In zool.: (a) Situated beneath the axilla or armpit. (b) Specifically, in ornith., same as axillary; as, "subaxillary feathers," Pennant.—2. In bot., placed under an axil, or angle formed by the branch of a plant with the stem, or by a leaf with the branch.—Subaxillary region. See region.

II. n.; pl. subaxillaries (-riz). In ornith., same as axillar or axillary.

subbass (sub'bās), n. In organ-building, a pedal stop resembling either the open or the stopped diapason, and of 16- or 32-foot tone. Also called subbardon.

subblush (sub-blush'), v. i. To blush slightly. [Rare.]

Raising up her eyes, sub-blushing as she did it. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix, 25.

subbourdon (sub-bör'don), n. Same as subbass. subbrachial (sub-brā'ki-āl), a. and n. Same as subbrachiate.

subbrachiate (sub-brā'ki-āt), a. and n. I. a. Situated under the pectorals, as the ventral fins; having the ventrals under the pectorals, as a fish.

II. n. A subbrachiate fish. See Subbrachiati. Subbrachiati (sub-brak-i-ā'ti), n. pl. An order of malacopterygian fishes, containing those which are subbrachiate: contrasted with Apoles and Abdominales. See under Malacopterygi.

subbrachycephalic (sub-brak'i-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. Nearly but not quite brachycephalic; somewhat short-headed; having a cephalic index of 80.01 to 83.33 (Broca). Nature, XLI, 357.

subbranch (sub'branch), n. 1. A subdivision of a branch, in any sense of that word. W. S. Jevons, Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, p. 258.—2. Specifically, in zoological classification, a prime division of a branch or phylum; a subphylum.

subbranchial (sub-brang'ki-āl), a. Situated under the gills.

subbreed (sub'bred'), n. A recognizable strain or marked subdivision of a breed; an incipient artificial race or stock. Darwin.

subbrigadier (sub'brig-ā-dēr'), n. An officer in the Horse Guards who ranks as cornet. [Eng.]

subcalcareous (sub-kal-kā'rē-us), a. Somewhat calcareous.

subcalcarine (sub-kal'kā-rin), a. Situated below the calcar, as of a bird, or below the calcarine fissure of the brain.

subcaliber (sub-kal'i-bér), a. Of less caliber; said of a projectile as compared with the bore of the gun. See subcaliber projectile, under projectile.

subcantor (sub-kan'tor), n. In music, same as successor, 1.

subcapsular (sub-kap'sū-lār), a. Situated under a capsule; being in the cavity of a capsule. Lancet, 1889, I, 787.—Subcapsular epithelium, an epitheloid lining of the inside of the capsule of a spinal ganglion.

Subcarboniferous (sub-kār-bō-nif'e-rus), n. and a. In geol., a name given by some geologists to the mountain-limestone division of the Carboniferous series, or that part of the series which lies beneath the millstone-grit. See carboniferous.

subcartilaginous (sub-kār-ti-laj'i-nus), a. 1. Situated below or beneath cartilage; lying under the costal cartilages; hypochondrial.—2. Partly or incompletely cartilaginous.

subcaudal (sub-kā'dal), a. and n. I. a. 1. Situated under the tail; placed on the under side of the tail; as, subcaudal chevron-bones; the subcaudal scutes, or urosteges, of a snake.—2. Not quite caudal or terminal; situated near the tail or tail-end; subterminal.—Subcaudal pouch, a pocket or recess beneath the root of the tail of the badger, above the anus, into which empty the secretions of certain subcaudal glands distinct from the ordinary anal or perineal glands of other Mustelidæ.

II. n. That which is subcaudal; specifically, in herpet., a urosteg; one of the special scutes upon the under side of the tail of a serpent.

subcaudate (sub-kā'dāt), a. 1. In entom., having an imperfect tail-like process; as, butterflies with subcaudate wings.—2. In bot. See sub- (f) 3.

subcelestial (sub-sē-les'tiāl), a. Being beneath the heavens.

The superlunary but subcelestial world. Harvey, Ireneus, p. xcvi.

subcellar (sub'sel'ār), n. A cellar beneath another cellar.

subcentral (sub-sen'tral), a. 1. Being under the center.—2. Nearly central; a little eccentric.

subcentrally (sub-sen'tral-i), adv. 1. Under the center.—2. Nearly centrally.

subcerebral (sub-ser'ē-brāl), a. Below the cerebrum; specifically, below the supposed seat of consciousness, or not dependent on volition; said of involuntary or reflex action in which the spinal cord, but not the brain, is concerned.

subchanter (sub'chān'tēr), n. In music, same as subcantor, successor, 1.

subchela (sub-kē'lā), n.; pl. subchelæ (-lē). The hooked end of an appendage which bends down upon the joint to which it is articulated, but has no other movable claw to oppose it and thus make a nipper or chela.

subchelate (sub-kē'lāt), a. Of the nature of or provided with a subchela. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 327.

subcheliform (sub-kē'li-fōrm), a. Subchelate. Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. (1855), III, 87.

subchlorid, subchloride (sub'klō'rid), n. A compound of chlorine with an element two atoms of which form a bivalent radical; as, subchlorid of copper (Cu_2Cl_2); subchlorid of mercury (Hg_2Cl_2 , calomel).

subchondral (sub-kon'dral), a. Lying underneath cartilage; subcartilaginous; as, subchondral osseous tissue.

subchordal (sub-kōr'dal), a. Situated beneath the chorda dorsalis, or notochord, of a vertebrate. Compare parachordal.

subchoroid (sub-kō'roid), a. Same as subchoroidal.

subchoroidal (sub-kō-roi'dal), a. Situated beneath the choroid tunic of the eye.—Subchoroidal dropsy, morbid accumulation of fluid between the adherent choroid sclerotic and the retina.

subcinctorium (sub-sing-kō'ri-um), n.; pl. subcinctoria (-ā). See succinctorium.

subclass (sub'klās), n. A prime subdivision of a class; in zool. and bot., a division or group of a grade between the class and the order; a superorder.

subclavate (sub-klā'vāt), a. Somewhat clavate; slightly enlarged toward the end.—Subclavate antennæ, in entom., antennæ in which the outer joints are somewhat larger than the basal ones, but without forming a distinct club.

subclavian (sub-klā'vi-an), a. and n. [< L. sub, under, + clavis, a key; see clavis, and cf. clavicle.] I. a. 1. Lying or extending under, beneath, or below the clavicle or collar-bone; subclavicular.—2. Pertaining to the subclavian artery or vein; as, the subclavian triangle or groove.—Subclavian artery, the principal artery of the root of the neck, arising on the right side from the innominate artery and on the left from the arch of the aorta, and ending in the axillary artery; the beginning or main trunk of the arterial system of the fore limb. See cuts under lung and embryo.—Subclavian groove, (a) A shallow depression on the surface of the first rib, denoting the situation of a subclavian vessel. There are two of them, separated by a tubercle, respectively in front of and behind the insertion of the anterior scalene muscle—the former for the subclavian vein, the latter for the subclavian artery. (b) A groove on the under side of the clavicle, for the insertion of the subclavius.—Subclavian muscle, the subclavius.—Subclavian nerve, the motor nerve of the subclavius muscle, arising from the fifth cervical nerve at its junction with the sixth.—Subclavian triangle. See triangle.—Subclavian vein, the continuation of the axillary vein from the lower border of the first rib to the sternoclavicular articulation, where the vessel ends by joining the internal jugular to form the innominate vein. See cut under lung.

II. n. A subclavian artery, vein, nerve, or muscle.

subclavicular (sub-klā'vik'ū-lār), a. Situated below the clavicle; infraclavicular; subclavian.—Subclavicular aneurism, an aneurism of the axillary artery situated too high to be ligated below the clavicle.—Subclavicular fossa, the surface depression below the outer end of the clavicle.—Subclavicular region. Same as infraclavicular region (which see, under infraclavicular).

subclavius (sub-klā'vi-us), n.; pl. subclavii (-ī). [NL.; see subclavian.] A muscle passing from the first rib to the under surface of the clavicle or collar-bone.—Subclavius posticus. Same as sternocleidomastoid.

Subcoccinella (sub-kok-si-nel'ä), n. [NL., < sub + Coccinella.] A genus of ladybirds or coccinellids based by Huber (1841) upon the widespread S. 24-punctata. Also called Lasia.

subcollateral (sub-kol-lat'e-räl), a. Situated below the collateral fissure of the brain.

subcommission (sub'kō-mish'qn), n. An under-commission; a division of a commission.

subcommissioner (sub'kō-mish'qn-ēr), n. A subordinate commissioner.

subcommittee (sub'kō-mit'ē), n. An under committee; a part or division of a committee.

subconcave (sub-kon'käv), a. Slightly concave.

subconcealed (sub-kon-seld'), a. Hidden underneath. Roger North, Examen, p. 439. (Davies.)

subconchoidal (sub-kong-koi'däl), a. Imperfectly conchoidal; having an imperfectly conchoidal fracture.

subconical (sub-kon'i-käl), a. Somewhat or not quite conical; conoidal.

subconjunctival (sub-kon-jungk-ti'väl), a. Situated beneath the conjunctiva.

subconnate (sub-kon'ät), a. In entom., partially connate; divided by an indistinct or partial suture.

subconscious (sub-kon'shus), a. 1. Partially or feebly conscious; of or pertaining to subconsciousness.—2. Being or occurring in the mind, but not in consciousness.

subconsciously (sub-kon'shus-li), adv. In a subconscious manner; with faint consciousness; without consciousness.

subconsciousness (sub-kon'shus-nes), n. 1. A form or state of consciousness in which there is little strength or distinctness of perception or mental action in general.—2. Mental processes conceived as taking place without consciousness.

The hypothesis of unconscious mental modifications, as it has been unfortunately termed—the hypothesis of subconsciousness, as we may style it to avoid this contradiction in terms. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 47.

subconstellation (sub'kon-ste-lä'shön), n. A subordinate or secondary constellation.

subcontiguous (sub-kon-tig'ü-us), a. Almost touching; very slightly separated: as, subcontiguous coxae.

subcontinuous (sub-kon-tin'ü-us), a. Almost continuous: noting a line or mark which has but slight breaks or interruptions.

subcontract (sub'kon'trakt), n. A contract under a previous contract.

subcontract (sub-kon'trakt'), v. i. To make a contract under a previous contract. Lancet, 1889, I. 498.

subcontracted (sub-kon-trak'ted), a. 1. Contracted under a former contract; betrothed for the second time. Shak., Lear, v. 3. 86.—2. In entom., slightly narrowed: noting wing-cells.

subcontractor (sub'kon-trak'tor), n. One who takes a part or the whole of a contract from the principal contractor.

subcontrariety (sub'kon-tra-ri'e-ti), n.; pl. subcontrarieties (-tiz). In logic, the relation between a particular affirmative and a particular negative proposition in the same terms; also, the inference from one to the other.

subcontrary (sub-kon'trä-ri), a. and n. I. a. Contrary in an inferior degree. (a) In geom., it denotes the relative position of two similar triangles of which one of the pairs of homologous angles coincide while the including sides are interchanged. Thus, in the cut the triangles ACB, ECD are subcontrary. (b) In logic the term is applied (1) to the particular affirmative proposition and the particular negative proposition, with relation to the universal affirmative proposition above them, which have the same subject and predicate: thus, "some man is mortal" and "some man is not mortal" are subcontrary propositions, with relation to "every man is mortal" and "no man is mortal," which are contraries; (2) to the relation between two attributes which co-exist in the same substance, yet in such a way that the more there is of one the less there is of the other.—Subcontrary section, one of the circular sections of a quadric cone in its relation to another circular section not parallel to it.

II. n.; pl. subcontraries (-riz). In logic, a subcontrary proposition.

subconvex (sub-kon'veks), a. Somewhat rounded or convex.

subcoracoid (sub-kor'a-koid), a. Situated or occurring below the coracoid process.

subcordate (sub-kör'dät), a. Nearly heart-shaped.

subcordiform (sub-kör'di-förm), a. Same as subcordate.

subcorneous (sub-kör'nē-us), a. 1. Somewhat horny; partly or partially converted into horn.—2. Placed beneath a layer of corneous structure; situated under or within a horn, nail, claw, or the like: as, the subcorneous frontal processes of a ruminant.

subcortical (sub-kör'ti-käl), a. Situated beneath the cortex. (a) Situated beneath the cerebral cortex. (b) Situated beneath the cortex of a sponge. (c) Situated or living beneath the cortex or bark of a tree.

subcosta (sub-kos'tä), n.; pl. subcostae (-tē). The subcostal vein or nervure of the wing of some insects; the first vein behind the costa. See cut under costal.

subcostal (sub-kos'täl), a. and n. I. a. 1. In anat. and zool.: (a) Situated below a rib; extending from one rib to a succeeding one; infracostal: specifically noting the muscles called subcostales. (b) Lying along the under side or edge of a rib: as, a subcostal groove for an artery. (c) Placed under or within the ribs or costal cartilages collectively; hypochondrial; subcartilaginous.—2. In entom., situated near, but not at or on, the costa: specifically noting the subcostal.—Subcostal angle, the angle which the costal border of one side forms with that of the other at the lower end of the sternum.—Subcostal cells, in entom., cells between the costal and subcostal veins: they are generally numbered from the base outward.—Subcostal vein or nervure, in entom., a strong longitudinal vein behind the costal vein and more or less parallel to the costal edge: in the Lepidoptera it forms the anterior edge of the large dorsal cell, and exteriorly it is divided into a number of branches, called subcostal veinules or nervules, and numbered from before backward. Sometimes called postcostal vein or nervure. See cut under costal.

II. n. 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) A subcostal or infracostal muscle. See subcostalis. (b) A subcostal artery, vein, or nerve, running along the groove in the lower border of a rib; an intercostal.—2. In entom., a subcostal vein or nervure; the subcosta.

subcostalis (sub-kos-tä'lis), n.; pl. subcostales (-lēs). In anat., a subcostal or infracostal muscle; any one of several muscles which extend from the lower border or inner surface of a rib to the first, second, or third succeeding rib.

subcranial (sub-krä'ni-äl), a. 1. Situated beneath the skull, in general.—2. Situated below the cranial axis or cranium proper—that is, in man, in front of the brain-case: as, the subcranial visceral arches of the embryo.

subcrenate (sub-kre'nät), a. Obscurely or irregularly scalloped.

subcrepitant (sub-krep'i-tant), a. Approaching in character the crepitant räle. See räle. Therapeutic Gaz., IX. 8.

subcrepitation (sub-krep-i-tä'shön), n. The noise of subcrepitant räles.

subcrescentic (sub-kre-sen'tik), a. Irregularly or imperfectly crescentic.

subcruræus (sub-kro-rē'us), n.; pl. subcruræi (-i). A small muscle arising from the fore part of the femur, beneath the cruræus, and inserted into the synovial pouch of the knee. Also called subcruralis, subfemorialis, and articularis genu.

subcrureal (sub-kro'rē-äl), a. Lying under or beneath the cruræus, as a muscle: specifying the subcruræus.

subcrystalline (sub-kris'tä-lin), a. Imperfectly crystalline.

subcultrate (sub-kul'trät), a. Somewhat cultriform; like a colter in being curved along one edge and straight along the other. Also subcultivated.

subculture (sub-kul'tür), n. In bacteriology, a culture derived from a previous culture.

subcutaneous (sub-kü-tä'nē-us), a. 1. Situated beneath the skin, in general; subdermal; lying in the true skin or cutis, under the cuticle; subcuticular; placed or performed under the skin; hypodermic: as, a subcutaneous injection.—2. Fitted for use under the skin; hypodermic: as, a subcutaneous syringe; a subcutaneous saw.—3. Living under the skin; burrowing in the skin: as, a subcutaneous parasitic insect.—Subcutaneous feeding, a mode of artificial feeding by means of large hypodermic injections of nutrient substances.—Subcutaneous fracture, simple fracture.—Subcutaneous method, the mode or manner of performing surgical operations, as tenotomy, osteotomy, etc., with the smallest possible opening through the skin.

subcutaneously (sub-kü-tä'nē-us-li), adv. In a subcutaneous manner, in any sense; hypodermically.

subcuticular (sub-kü-tik'ü-lär), a. Situated under the cuticle or scarf-skin; subepidermic; cutaneous; dermal.

subcutis (sub'kü'tis), n. [NL., < L. sub, under, + cutis, skin.] The deeper part of the cutis, corium, or true skin, sometimes distinguished from the rest. Haeckel.

subcylindric, subcylindrical (sub-si-lin'drik, -dri-käl), a. Nearly or somewhat cylindrical.

subdatory (sub'dä'tä-ri), n. The head of the officials under the datory or prodatory. See *datory*¹.

subdeacon (sub'dē'kn), n. [ME. sūddekene, sudekene = OF. sodekene, also soudiacre = Sp. subdiácono = Pg. subdiácono = It. suddiacono, < LL. subdiaconus, < L. sub, under, + LL. diaconus, a deacon: see deacon.] A member of the ecclesiastical order next below that of deacon. Subdeacons are first mentioned in the third century. They assisted the deacons, and kept order at the doors of the church. In the Western Church the duty of the subdeacon is to prepare the holy vessels and the bread, wine, and water for the eucharist, to pour the water into the chalice, and, since the seventh or eighth century, to read the epistle—a duty previously, as still in the East, assigned to the reader. In the Greek Church the subdeacon prepares the holy vessels, and guards the gates of the bema during liturgy. In the Greek Church the subdeaconate has always been one of the minor orders. In the Western Church it became one of the major or holy orders in the twelfth century. The bishop, priest, or other cleric who acts as second or subordinate assistant at the eucharist is called the subdeacon, and the term is used in this sense in the Anglican Church also, although that church has no longer an order of subdeacons. See epistler.

subdeaconry (sub'dē'kn-ri), n. [subdeacon + -ry.] Same as subdeaconship.

subdeaconship (sub'dē'kn-ship), n. The order or office of subdeacon; the subdiaconate.

subdean (sub'dēn), n. [ME. sūddene, sodene, also southdene, < *OF. soudeien, sousdoyen, < ML. subdecanus, subdean, < L. sub, under, + decanus, dean: see *dean*².] A vice-dean; a dean's substitute or vicegerent.

Secutours and sūdenes. Piers Plowman (C), xvii. 277.

subdeanery (sub'dē'nēr-i), n. [subdean + -ery.] The office or rank of subdean.

subdecanal (sub-dek'a-näl), a. [ML. subdecanus, subdean, + -al.] Relating to a subdean or his office.

subdecimal (sub-des'i-mäl), a. Derived by division by a multiple of ten.

subdecuple (sub-dek'ü-pl), a. Containing one part of ten (Johnson); having the ratio 1:10.

subdelegate (sub'del'ē-gät), n. A subordinate delegate.

subdelegate (sub-del'ē-gät), v. t. To appoint to act as subdelegate or under another.

subdelirium (sub-dē-lir'i-um), n. Mild delirium with lucid intervals.

subdeltoidal (sub-del-toi'däl), a. Approaching in shape the Greek letter Δ. Also subdeltoid.

subdentate (sub-den'tät), a. 1. Imperfectly dentate; having indistinct teeth; denticulate.—2. Of cetaceans, having teeth in the lower jaw only: the opposite of superdentate. Dewhurst, 1834. [Rare.]

subdentated (sub-den'tä-ted), a. Same as subdentate, 1.

subdentent (sub-den'ted), a. Indented beneath. Imp. Dict.

subdepressed (sub-dē-prest'), a. Somewhat depressed or flattened.

subderisorious (sub-der-i-sō'ri-us), a. [L. sub, under, + derisorius, serving for laughter, ridiculous: see derisory.] Ridiculing with moderation or delicacy. Dr. H. More.

subderivative (sub-dē-riv'a-tiv), n. A word following another in immediate grammatical derivation, or a word derived from a derivative and not directly from the root. [Rare.]

subdermal (sub-dér'mäl), a. Beneath the skin; hypodermal; subcutaneous.

subdeterminant (sub-dē-tēr'mi-nant), n. In math., a determinant from a symmetrically taken part of a matrix.

subdiaconate (sub-dī-ak'ō-nät), n. [*ML. subdiaconatus, < LL. subdiaconus, subdeacon: see subdeacon.] The office or order of subdeacon.

subdial (sub'di-äl), a. [= OF. subdial, < L. subdialis, subdialis, that is in the open air, < sub, under, + divum, the sky, the open air, akin to dies, day, Skt. dyu, the sky: see deity, dial.] Of or pertaining to the open air; being under the open sky. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

The Athenian Heliastick or Subdial Court was rural, and for the most part kept in the open air. N. Bacon, iv. 15.

subdialect (sub'di'ä-lekt), n. An inferior dialect; a subordinate or less important or prominent dialect.

subdiapente (sub-dī-a-pen'tē), n. In medieval music, an interval of a fifth below a given tone.

subdiatessaron (sub-dī-ā-tēs'sā-rōn), n. In music, an interval of a fourth below a diatessaron.

subdichotomy (sub-dī-kō'tō-mī), n. A subdivision of a dichotomy, or division into parts: a subdivision. Hutton, Arcopagitea, p. 53.

subdistinction (sub-dīs-tīng'chōn), n. A subdistinction. Sir M. Hale.

subdistrict (sub-dīs-trīkt), n. A part or division of a district.

subditious (sub-dī-tī'sh'us), a. [L. subditus, subditus, substituted, supposititious, < subdere, put or set under, < sub, under, + dare, put.] Put secretly in the place of something else; foisted in. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

subdiversify (sub-dī-vēr'sī-fī), v. t. To diversify again what is already diversified. Sir M. Hale. [Rare.]

subdivide (sub-dī-vīd'), v.; pret. and pp. subdivided, ppr. subdividing. [= Sp. Pg. subdividir = It. dividere, < LL. dividere, subdivide, < L. sub, under, + dividere, divide: see divide.] I. trans. To redivide after a first division.

The progenies of Cham and Japhet swarmed into colonies, and those colonies were subdivided into many others. Dezobry.

II. intrans. 1. To separate into subdivisions.

Amongst some men a sect is sufficiently thought to be reformed if it subdivides and breaks into little fractions, or changes its own opinions. Jer. Taylor, Works, VI. 125.

2. To become separated. [Rare.]

When Brutus and Cassius were overthrown, then soon after Antoinus and Octavius broke and subdivided.

Bacon, Faction (ed. 1887).

subdivisible (sub-dī-vīz'ī-bl), a. Susceptible of subdivision.

subdivision (sub-dī-vīz'hōn), n. [= F. subdivision = Sp. subdivisión = Pg. subdivisão, < LL. subdivisio(n-), < subdividere, subdivide: see subdivide.] 1. The act of redividing, or separating into smaller parts.

When any of the parts of an idea are yet farther divided in order to a clear explication of the whole, this is called a subdivision. Watts, Logic, I. vi. § 8.

2. A minor division; a part of a part; specifically, in zool. and bot., a minor division of a group; a subsection: as, subdivisions of a genus.

In the Decimal Table the subdivisions of the Cubit, viz. the Span, Palm, and Digit, are deduced . . . from the shorter Cubit. Arbutnot, Ancient Coins, p. 73.

subdivisional (sub-dī-vīz'hōn-āl), a. [< subdivision + -al.] Of or pertaining to subdivision or a subdivision: as, a subdivisional name. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. ii. 62.

subdivisive (sub-dī-vī'sīv), a. [< LL. subdivisurus, < subdividere, subdivide: see subdivide.] Arising from subdivision.

When a whole is divided into parts, these parts may, either all or some, be themselves still connected multiplicatively; and, if these are again divided, there results a subdivision the several parts of which are called the subdivisive members. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, Lect. xxv.

subdolichocephalic (sub-dō'l'ī-kō-sef'a-lik or -se-fal'ik), a. In craniom., having a cephalic index ranging between 75.01 and 77.77 in Broca's classification.

subdolous (sub-dō-lus), a. [< LL. subdolosus, < L. subdolos, somewhat crafty or deceitful, < sub, under, + dolus, artifice, guile: see dole.] Somewhat crafty; sly; cunning; artful; deceitful. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 14.

subdoulosly (sub-dō-lus-lī), adv. In a subdoulos manner; slyly; artfully. Evelyn, To Pepys, Dec. 5, 1681.

subdulousness (sub-dō-lus-nes), n. The state of being subdulous. Baker, Chronicles, p. 382.

subdominant (sub-dō-mī-nant), n. In music, the tone next below the dominant in a scale; the fourth, as D in the scale of A: also used adjectively. See diagram under circle.

subdorsal (sub-dōr'sāl), a. In entom., situated on the side of the upper or dorsal surface of the body: as, subdorsal stripe.

subdouble (sub-dub'l), a. Being in the ratio of 1 to 2.

subduable (sub-dū'a-bl), a. [< subdu + -able.] Capable of being subdued; conquerable. Imp. Dict.

subdual (sub-dū'al), n. [< subdue + -al.] The act of subduing. Warburton, Works (ed. Hurd), VI. 329.

subduce (sub-dū's), v. t.; pret. and pp. subduced, ppr. subducing. [< L. subducere, pp. subductus, < sub, under, + ducere, lead, haul up, take away, < ducere, < ducere, lead, haul up: see duct.] CF. subduct.] 1. To withdraw; take away; draw off; lift up.

It shall be expedient for such as intend to exercise prayer . . . to subduce and convey themselves from the company of the worldly people.

Bacon, Early Works, p. 130.

2. To subtract arithmetically.

If, out of that supposed infinite multitude of antecedent generation, we should . . . subduce ten, . . . the residue must needs be less by ten than it was before that subtraction. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 10.

subduct (sub-dūkt'), v. t. [< L. subductus, pp. of subducere, draw from under, take away: see subduce.] Same as subduce, 1.

He . . . established himself upon the rug, . . . subducting his coat-tails one under each arm.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 32.

subduction (sub-dūk'shōn), n. [< L. subductio(n-), a hauling ashore (of a ship), a taking away, < subducere, pp. subductus, haul up, take away: see subduce.] 1. The act of subducting, taking away, or withdrawing. Bp. Hall, Occasional Meditations, § 66.—2. Arithmetical subtraction. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 10.

subdue (sub-dū'), v. t.; pret. and pp. subdued, ppr. subduing. [< ME. subduen, earlier soduen, sodewen, sudewen, < OF. souduire, lead away, seduce, prob. also subdue, < L. subducere, draw from under, lift up, take away, remove: see subduce, subduct.] 1. To conquer and bring into permanent subjection; reduce under dominion.

John of Gaunt,

Which did subdue the greatest part of Spain.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 82.

Rome learning arts from Greece whom she subdued. Pope, Prol. to Addison's Cato, I. 40.

2. To overpower by superior force; gain the victory over; bring under; vanquish; crush.

Tugg'd for life, and was by strength subdued.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 173.

Lay hold upon him; if he do resist,

Subdue him at his peril. Shak., Othello, I. 2. 81.

Think of thy woman's nature, subdued in hopeless thrall.

Whittier, Cassandra Southwick.

3. To prevail over by some mild or softening influence; influence by association; assimilate; overcome, as by kindness, persuasion, entreaty, or other mild means; gain complete sway over; melt.

My nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.

Shak., Sonnets, cxi.

If aught

Therein enjoy'd were worthy to subdue
The soul of man.

Milton, P. L., viii. 584.

Claspt hands and that petitionary grace
Of sweet seventeen subdued me ere she spoke.

Tennyson, The Brook.

4. To bring down; reduce.

Nothing could have subdued nature

To such a lowness but his unkind daughters.

Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 72.

5. To tone down; soften; make less striking or harsh, as in sound, illumination, or color: in this sense generally in the past participle: as, subdued colors; a subdued light.

The voices of the disputants fell, and the conversation was carried on thenceforth in a more subdued tone.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 17.

6. To improve by cultivation; make mellow; break, as land.

In proportion as the soil is brought into cultivation, or subdued, to use the local phrase, the consumers will become more numerous, and their means more extensive.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., I. 86.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Vanquish, Subjugate, etc. (see conquer), crush, quell.—3. To soften.

subdue (sub-dū'), n. [ME., < subdue, v.] Subjugation; conquest. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 5.

subduement (sub-dū'mēt), n. [< subdue + -ment.] Subdual; conquest. Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 187.

subduer (sub-dū'ēr), n. [< subdue + -er.] One who or that which subdues; one who conquers and brings into subjection; a conqueror; a tamer.

subdulcid (sub-dul'sid), a. [< L. subdulcis, sweetish (< sub, under, + dulcis, sweet), + -id.] Somewhat sweet; sweetish. Evelyn, Acetaria (ed. 1706), p. 154. [Rare.]

subduple (sub-dū-pl), a. [< L. sub, under, + duplus, double.] Having the ratio of 1 to 2.—Subduple ratio, in math. See duple.

subduplicate (sub-dū'pli-kāt), a. In math., expressed by the square root: as, the subduplicate ratio of two quantities—that is, the ratio of their square roots. Thus, the subduplicate ratio of a to b is the ratio of \sqrt{a} to \sqrt{b} , or it is the ratio whose duplicate is that of a to b.

subdural (sub-dū'rāl), a. Situated beneath the dura mater, between the dura mater and the arachnoid.—Subdural space, the interval between the dura mater and the arachnoid, formerly called the cavity of the arachnoid, when the latter membrane was supposed to be reflected continuously from the outer surface of the pia mater to the inner surface of the dura mater.

subectodermal (sub-ek-tō-dēr'māl), a. Situated underneath the ectoderm. Jour. Micros. Sci., XXVIII. 381.

subedit (sub-ed'it), v. t. To edit under the supervision of another. Thackeray, Philip, xlii.

subeditor (sub-ed'it-tōr), n. An assistant or subordinate editor; one who subedits.

subeditorial (sub-ed-i-tō'rī-āl), a. Of or pertaining to a subeditor. Athenæum, No. 3238, p. 653.

subeditorship (sub-ed'it-tōr-ship), n. [< subeditor + -ship.] The office or charge of a subeditor. Thackeray, Philip, xxx.

subelaphine (sub-el'a-fīn), a. Resembling the red-deer, Cervus elaphus, as in the structure of the antlers, but having the brow-line simple, not reduplicated, as in the genera Dama and Pseudaxis: correlated with elaphine.

subelliptic (sub-e-lip'tik), a. Somewhat elongate-ovate; between ovate and elliptic or oblong and elliptic.

subelliptical (sub-e-lip'ti-kāl), n. Same as subelliptic.

submarginate (sub-ē-mār'jī-nāt), a. Slightly emarginate.

subendocardial (sub-en-dō-kār'dī-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the endocardium.—Subendocardial tissue, the substance of the heart immediately underneath the endocardium.

subendothelial (sub-en-dō-thē'li-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the endothelium.

subentitle (sub-en-tī'tl), v. t. To give a subordinate title to. The Academy, Jan. 4, 1890, p. 7.

subepidermal (sub-ep-i-dēr'māl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the epidermis, in any sense.

subepithelial (sub-ep-i-thē'li-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the epithelium.—Subepithelial endothelium, Debove's name for an almost continuous layer of connective-tissue cells between the mucous membrane and the epithelium of the bronchi, bladder, and intestine.—Subepithelial plexus. See plexus.

subequal (sub-ē'kwāl), a. 1. Nearly equal.—2. Related as several numbers of which no one is as large as the sum of the rest.

subequilateral (sub-ē-kwi-lat'ē-rāl), a. Nearly equilateral, as a bivalve shell.

subequivalve (sub-ē'kwi-valv), a. Nearly equivalent, as a bivalve shell.

suber (sū'bēr), n. [NL., < L. suber, cork, the cork-oak.] In bot., same as cork! 3.

suberate (sū'bē-rāt), n. [< suber-ic + -ate.] A salt ($C_8H_{12}M_2O_4$) of suberic acid.

suberect (sub-ē-rekt'), a. Nearly erect.

subereous (sū-bē'rē-us), a. [< L. subereus, of cork, pertaining to the cork-oak, < suber, cork, the cork-oak.] Corky; suberose; in entom., specifying a soft elastic substance, somewhat like cork, found in the mature galls of some cynipidous insects.

suberic (sū-bēr'ik), a. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to cork; subereous.—Suberic acid, $C_8H_{14}O_4$, a dibasic acid which forms small granular crystals very soluble in boiling water, in alcohol, and in ether; it fuses at about 300° F., and sublimes in acicular crystals. It is prepared by treating rasped cork with nitric acid. It is also produced when nitric acid acts on stearic, margaric, or oleic acid, and other fatty bodies.

suberiferous (sū-bē-rif'ē-rus), a. [< suber(in) + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing or producing suberin.

suberification (sū-bē-rif-i-kā'shōn), n. [< L. suber, cork, + -ficatio(n-), < facere, make.] In bot., same as suberization.

suberin, suberine (sū-bē-rin), n. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -in, < -ine.] The cellular tissue of cork after the various soluble matters have been removed. It is allied to cellulose. See cork! 2.

suberization (sū-bē-rī-zā'shōn), n. [< suberize + -ation.] In bot., the transformation of a membrane or cell-wall into suberin or cork.

suberize (sū-bē-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. suberized, ppr. suberizing. [< L. suber, cork, + -ize.] In bot., to render corky, as a cell-wall.

suberoded (sub-ē-rō'ded), a. Same as suberose! 1.

suberose! (sub-ē-rōs'), a. [< L. sub, under, + erosus, pp. of erodere, gnaw off or away, consume: see erode.] In bot., slightly erose; appearing as if a little eaten or gnawed on the margin.

suberose! 2, suberous (sū'bē-rōs, -rus), a. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -ose, < -ous.] Same as subereous, suberic.

subesophageal, subesophageal (sub-ē-sō-faj'-ē-āl), a. Situated below or beneath the esophagus or gullet; in Arthropoda, specifying certain nervous ganglia which lie underneath (ventrad of) the esophagus. Also infra-esophageal.—Subesophageal ganglion. See ganglion.

subfactor (sub-fak'tor), n. An under factor or agent. Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xli.

subfactorial (sub-fak-tō'ri-āl), n. One of a series of numbers calculated as follows. Starting with 1, multiply it by 1 and subtract 1, getting 0, which is called subfactorial one; multiply this by 2 and add 1, getting 1, which is called subfactorial two; multiply this by 3 and subtract 1, getting 2, which is called subfactorial three; multiply this by 4 and add 1, getting 3, which is called subfactorial four. This is carried on indefinitely.

subfalcial (sub-fal'si-āl), a. Running along the under edge of the falx cerebri; as, "a subfalcial sinus." Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 121.

subfalciiform (sub-fal'si-fōrm), a. Somewhat false-form. Günther.

subfamily (sub-fam'i-li), n. In zool., the first subdivision of a family, containing several genera or only one genus. A subfamily may be introduced formally between the genus and the family when there is no other subdivision. Then the only subfamily of a family is continuous with the higher group. Subfamilies are now regularly indicated by the termination -inae; as, family Felidae, subfamily Felinae. That subfamily which takes the name of the family with a different termination is usually regarded as the typical subdivision of the family.

subfascial (sub-fash'i-āl), a. Situated below any fascia.

subfebrile (sub-fē'bril), a. Somewhat but not decidedly febrile.

subfemorals (sub-fem-ō-rā'lis), n.; pl. subfemorals (-lēz). Same as subcervicis.

subfeu (sub-fū'), v. t. [sub- + feu, after ML. subfeudare; see sub- and *feud*², feoff.] To make subinfeudation of: said of a vassal who vests lands held by him as such in a subvassal.

It was . . . impossible to subfeu the burgh lands. Encyc. Brit., IV, 63.

subfeudation (sub-fū-dā'shōn), n. [ML. subfeudatio(n)-], < subfeudare, subfeu: see subfeu.] Same as subinfeudation.

It seems most probable that this practice, which is called subfeudation or subinfeudation, began while the feud was only for life. Brougham.

subfeudatory (sub-fū-dā-tō-ri), n.; pl. subfeudatories (-riz). [< sub- + feudatory. Cf. ML. subfeudatarius.] An inferior tenant who held a feud from a feudatory of the crown or other superior.

subflavor (sub-flā'vor), n. A subordinate flavor; a secondary flavor.

subflavous (sub-flā'vus), a. [< L. sub, under, + flavus, yellow: see flavous.] Yellowish.—Subflavous ligament, a short ligament of yellow elastic tissue interposed between the laminae of the vertebrae.

subflora (sub-flō'rā), n. [NL., < sub- + flora.] A more local flora included in a territorially broader one.

subfluvial (sub-flō'vi-āl), a. [< L. sub, under, + fluvius, stream: see fluvial.] Situated under a river or stream.

The sub-fluvial avenue (Thames tunnel). Hawthorne, Our Old Home, p. 285.

subfoliar (sub-fō'li-ār), a. [*< subfolium + -ar*³.] Having the character of a subfolium. B. G. Wilder.

subfolium (sub-fō'li-um), n.; pl. subfolia (-ā). A small or secondary folium, as of the cerebellum. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 127.

subform (sub-fōrm), n. A secondary form. Jour. Micros. Sci., XXX, 195.

subformical (sub-fōr'ni-kal), a. Situated beneath the fornix of the brain.

subfossil (sub-fos'il), a. Partly fossilized; imperfectly petrified.

subfossilized (sub-fos'il-izd), a. Same as subfossil.

subfossorial (sub-fō-sō'ri-āl), a. In entom., adapted in some measure for digging: said of the legs when they approach the fossorial type.

subfrontal (sub-fron'tal), a. Situated under the front, face, or fore end; subterminal in front.—Subfrontal area, of Limulus, a smooth flattened space on the ventral surface of the cephalic shield anteriorly. See Limulus (with cut).—Subfrontal fold, of trilobites, an inferior inflection of the limb or marginal area of the cephalic shield.

subfulcrum (sub-ful'krum), n.; pl. subfulcra (-krā). In entom., a rarely differentiated labial sclerite between the mentum and the palpalp (the latter in some systems being called the fulcrum). It occurs in certain carabid and scarabæid larvae.

subfumigation (sub-fū-mi-gā'shōn), n. Same as subfumigation.

subfusc, a. See subfusk.

subfuscus (sub-fus'kus), a. [< L. subfuscus: see subfusk.] Same as subfusk.

subfusiform (sub-fū'si-fōrm), a. More or less nearly fusiform or spindle-shaped.

subfusk, subfusc (sub-fusk'), a. [< L. subfuscus, subfuscus, somewhat brown: see sub- and fuscous.] Dusky; moderately dark; brownish; tawny; lacking in color.

O'er whose quiescent walls
Arachne's unmolested care has drawn Certain subfusk. Shenstone, Economy, iii.

The University statute requiring the wearing only of black or subfusc clothing. Dickens, Dict. of Oxford, p. 66.

subgalea (sub-gā'lē-ā), n.; pl. subgaleæ (-ē). [NL., < L. sub, under, + NL. galea.] One of the sclerites of the typical maxilla of insects. It usually articulates with the stipes and bears the galea. In many beetles it is united with the lacinia. See cut under galea.

subganoid (sub-gan'oid), a. Having a somewhat ganoid character: as, a subganoid scale.

subgelatinous (sub-jē-lat'i-nus), a. Imperfectly or partially gelatinous.

subgenera, n. Plural of subgenus.

subgeneric (sub-jē-ner'ik), a. Of or pertaining to a subgenus; having the rank, grade, or value of a subgenus.

subgenerical (sub-jē-ner'i-kal), a. Same as subgeneric.

subgenerically (sub-jē-ner'i-kal-i), adv. So as to be subgeneric; as a subgenus.

subgeniculate (sub-jē-nik'ū-lāt), a. Imperfectly geniculate or elbowed.

subgenital (sub-jen'i-tal), a. Situated beneath the genitalia; specifically noting certain pits or pouches of jellyfishes, as the rhizostomous or monostomous discomedusans.

subgenus (sub-jē'nus), n.; pl. subgenera (-jen'-ē-rā). [NL., < L. sub, under, + genus, kind: see genus.] A subordinate genus; a section or subdivision of a genus higher than a species. Since there is no fixed definition of a genus, there can be none of a subgenus; and thousands of groups in zoology formerly regarded as subgenera, or disregarded entirely, are now named and held to be genera. Though there is theoretically or technically a difference, it is ignored in practice; since a name, whether given as that of a genus or of a subgenus, is a generic name. The case is somewhat different in practice from that of the names of families and subfamilies, whose difference in termination preserves a formal distinction, and from that of the names of all supergeneric groups, because none of these enter into the technical binomial designation of a given animal or plant. Thus, the name Lynx may have been given to a subdivision of the genus Felis, and be thus a subgeneric name; but a cat of this kind, as the bay lynx, would be known by the alternative names Felis rufus and Lynx rufus, according to the difference of expert opinion in the case; or, as a compromise, the subgeneric term would be formally introduced in parentheses between the generic and the specific name, as Felis (Lynx) rufus. In botany a subgenus is a section of a genus so strongly marked as to have plausible claims to be itself an independent genus.

subgett, a. and n. A Middle English form of subject.

subglabrous (sub-glā'brus), a. In entom., almost devoid of hairs or other like covering.

subglacial (sub-glā'shial), a. Situated or occurring beneath or under a glacier: as, a subglacial stream.

subglenoid (sub-glē'noid), a. Lying or occurring immediately below the glenoid fossa.

subglobose (sub-glō'bōs), a. Nearly globose; subspherical; spheroidal.

subglobular (sub-glob'ū-lār), a. Nearly globular.

subglobulose (sub-glob'ū-lōs), a. Somewhat globulose.

subglossal (sub-glos'al), a. Same as hypoglossal or sublingual.

subglottic (sub-glot'ik), a. Situated under the glottis, or beneath the true vocal cords of the larynx.

subglumaceous (sub-glō-mā'shius), a. Somewhat glumaceous.

subgrade (sub'grad), n. A grade of the second rank in zoological classification; a prime division of a grade: used like subclass, suborder, etc. See grade, 3.

Subgrallatores (sub-gral-ā-tō'rēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. sub, under, + NL. Grallatores, q. v.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a cohort of Galiniæ, composed of the genera Thinocorus, Attagis, and Chionis. [Not in use.]

subgrallatorial (sub-gral-ā-tō'ri-āl), a. Imperfectly grallatorial; exhibiting imperfectly the characters of the grallatorial birds.

subgranular (sub-gran'ū-lār), a. Somewhat granular.

subgroup (sub'grōp), n. 1. Any subordinate group in classification; a subdivision of a group; especially, a division the name of which begins with sub-, as subfamily or subgenus.—2. A mathematical group forming part of another group.

subgular (sub-gū'lār), a. Situated under the throat, or on the under side of the throat; subjugular.

subhastation (sub-has-tā'shōn), n. [= F. subhastation = Sp. subastacion = It. subastazione, < L. subhastatio(n)-], a sale by public auction, < subhastare, pp. subhastatus, sell at public auction, lit. 'bring under the spear' (in allusion to the Roman practice of planting a spear on the spot where a public sale was to take place), < L. sub, under, + hasta, a spear, a lance.] A public sale of property to the highest bidder; a sale by auction. Bp. Burnet, Letters from Switzerland, p. 9.

subhead (sub'hed), n. A subordinate head or title; a subdivision of a heading. See head, 13.

subheading (sub'hed'ing), n. Same as subhead.

subhepatic (sub-hē-pat'ik), a. In anat. and zool.: (a) Of doubtful or disputed hepatic character, as a glandular tissue of some invertebrates, which resembles that of the liver. (b) Lying under the liver, on the ventral side of hepatic lobules; sublobular, as ramifications of the portal vein in the liver. (c) Situated beneath the hepatic region: specifically applied to an anterolateral division of the ventral surface of the carapace in brachyurous crustaceans. See Brachyura (with cut).

subhexagonal (sub-hek-sag'ō-nal), a. Six-sided, but not forming a regular hexagon.

Sub-Himalayan (sub-him-ā'lā-yān), a. Related to or forming the whole or a part of the Sub-Himalayas, the designation adopted by the Geological Survey of India for a fringe or belt of hills extending along the southern edge of the Himalayan chain almost uninterruptedly for a distance of 1,500 miles, and composed of Tertiary rocks.

By abrupt difference of elevation and by contour, the Sub-Himalayan hills are everywhere easily distinguishable from the much higher mountains to the north of them. Geol. of India, ii, 521.

Sub-Himalayan system, in geol., the name adopted by the Geological Survey of India for the system of rocks forming the Sub-Himalayan division of the Himalayas. It is divided into two series—the Siwalik (subdivided into three subgroups, the Upper, Middle, and Lower) and the Simaur (also with three subgroups, the Upper or Kasauli, the Middle or Dagshai, and the Lower or Subathu). See Siwalik.

subhuman (sub-hū'man), a. Under or beneath the human; next below the human.

Pretended superhuman birth and origin. . . lives and characters more decidedly subhuman than those of common men. E. H. Sears, The Fourth Gospel, p. 230.

subhumeral (sub-hū'mē-ral), a. Situated below the humerus.

subhumeral (sub-hū'mē-rāt), v. t. [< L. sub, under, + humerus, prop. umerus, shoulder, + *-ate*².] To take or bear on one's shoulders. Feltham, Resolves, i, 82.

subhyaloid (sub-hī'a-loid), a. Situated beneath (on the attached side of) the hyaloid membrane of the eyeball.

subhymenial (sub-hī-mē'ni-āl), a. In bot., lying under or just below the hymenium.—Subhymenial layer, a stratum of hyphal tissue under the hymenium in some fungi; the hypothecium, and sometimes another layer still further below. See cuts under apothecium and ascus.

subhyoid (sub-hī'oid), a. 1. Situated below the hyoid bone, as of man.—2. Coming next in order after the hyoid arch from before backward; specifically, noting the fourth visceral arch of the vertebrate embryo, or first branchial arch proper.

subhyoidean (sub-hī-oi'dē-an), a. Same as subhyoid.

subicteric (sub-ik-ter'ik), a. Somewhat but not distinctly icteric.

subiculum (sū-bik'ū-lum), n. [NL., dim. of subex (subic)-, in pl. subices, a layer, < subicere, throw under: see subject.] 1. The uncus.—2. In bot., the modified tissue of the host penetrated by the mycelium of a parasite. Burrill.

subiliac (sub-il'i-ak), a. 1. Pertaining to the subilium.—2. Situated below the ilium.

subilium (sub'il'i-um), n.; pl. subilia (-ā). [NL., < L. sub, under, + NL. ilium, q. v.] An inferior section of the ilium, supposed to correspond to the subscapula.

subimaginal sub-i-maj'i-nal, a. [< subimago (sub-im-a-gō) + -al]. Having the character of a subimage; not quite perfect or imaginal, as an insect's pseudimaginal.

subimaginary sub-i-maj-i-nj-ri, a. Imaginary, but of a different source. Subimaginary transformation, the transformation defined by equations between the x and y axes, which equations are imaginary, is a transformation, but not a linear transformation, in that way it is transformed into a real function.

subimago sub-i-mā-gō, n.: pl. subimagoes or subimagoes (sub-i-mā-gō-zōr-maj-i-nēz). [N.L., < L. sub, under, + imago, image; see imago.] An imperfect or incomplete winged stage in certain pseudoneuropterous and neuropterous insects, succeeding the pupa, and preceding the imago. Also called pseudimago. The insect in this stage is active, and resembles the imago, but has to shed another skin. This stage occurs as a rule in the Ephemeroidea of the Pseudoneuroptera, and Riley has recorded it in Chrysopa of the Neuroptera.

subimpressed (sub-im-prest'), a. In entom., slightly impressed; having indistinct impressions.

subincomplete (sub-in-kom-plēt'), a. In entom., noting that metamorphosis of an insect in which the active larva and pupa resemble the imago, the pupa having rudimentary wings, as in the grasshoppers.

subincusation (sub-in-kū-zā'shon), n. [< L. sub, under, + incusatio(n), accusation, < in, on, against, + causa, a cause, suit; see cause. Cf. accuse.] An implied charge or accusation.

But all this cannot deliver thee [Mary] from the just blame of this hold subincusation: Lord, dost thou not care? Bp. Hall, Contemplations, Mary and Martha.

subindicate (sub-in-di-kāt), v. t. To indicate secondarily; indicate in a less degree.

subindication (sub-in-di-kā'shon), n. The act of indicating secondarily; a slight indication. Barrow.

subindicative (sub-in-dik'a-tiv), a. Partially or secondarily indicative. Lamb, Some of the Old Actors.

subindividual (sub-in-di-vid'ū-al), n. A division of that which is individual.

An individual cannot branch itself into subindividuals. Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst., § 13.

subinduce (sub-in-dūs'), v. t. To insinuate; suggest; offer or bring into consideration imperfectly or indirectly. Sir E. Dering, Speeches in Parliament, p. 114.

subinfer (sub-in-fēr'), v. t. To infer or deduce from an inference already made. Bp. Hall, Resol. for Religion.

subinfundation (sub-in-fū-dā'shon), n. [< OF. subinfundatio, < L. sub, under, + ML. infundatio(n), infundation; see infundation.] 1. The process, in feudal tenure, where the stipendiary or feudatory, considering himself as substantially the owner, began to imitate the example of his sovereign by carving out portions of the benefice or feud, to be held of himself by some other person, on terms and conditions similar to those of the original grant: a continued chain of successive dependencies was thus established, connecting each stipendiary, or vassal as he was termed, with his immediate superior or lord. H. Stephen. See Statute of Quia Emptores, under statute.

The widow is immediate tenant to the heir, by a kind of subinfundation or under tenancy. Blackstone, Com., II. viii.

2. The fief or tenancy thus established.

These smaller fiefs were called subinfundations, and were, in fact, mere subdivisions of the larger fiefs. Stille, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 137.

Also subinfundation.

subinfundatory (sub-in-fū-dā-tō-ri), n.: pl. subinfundatories (fū-dā-tō-ri). One who holds by subinfundation.

At the time of the Conquest the manor was granted to Walter d'Eu, and in the 12th century it was divided among the three daughters of his subinfundatory Paganus. Engl. Brit., XX. 298.

subinflammation sub-in-flā-mā'shon), n. Incipient or undeveloped inflammation.

subinflammatory (sub-in-flām'a-tō-ri), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of a slight and indistinct degree of inflammation.

subingression (sub-in-gresh'on), n. The penetration by one body of the substance of another body.

An eminent naturalist hath taught that, when the air is subjected to a violent vibration, when with it is wont to penetrate, it gets pressed mainly from this, that the pressure of the ambient air is strengthened upon the accession of the air sucked out, which, to make itself room, forceth the neighboring air to a violent subingression of its parts. Boyle, New Experiments Touching the Spring of the Air, [Exp. iii.]

subinspector (sub'in-spek'tor), n. A subordinate or assistant inspector.

subinspectorship (sub'in-spek'tor-ship), n. [< subinspector + -ship.] The office or jurisdiction of a subinspector.

subintestinal (sub-in-tes'ti-nal), a. Situated beneath the intestine.

subintroduce (sub-in-trō-dūs'), v. t. To introduce in a subordinate or secondary manner.

Although presbyters join not in the consecration of a bishop, yet of a presbyter they do; but this is only by a positive subintroduced constitution, first made in a provincial of Africa. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 198.

subinvariant (sub-in-vā'ri-ant), n. Any rational integral function, ϕ , of the letters a, b, c, \dots , which satisfies the partial differential equation $(aD_a + bD_b + cD_c + \dots)\phi = 0$.

subinvolute (sub-in'vō-lū-tē), a. Exhibiting incomplete involution. Medical News, L. 394.

subinvolution (sub-in'vō-lū'shon), n. Incomplete involution. Barnes, Diseases of Women, xxxviii.

subitaneoust (sub-i-tā'nē-us), a. [< L. subitaneus, sudden, < subitus, sudden, unexpected; see sudden.] Sudden; hasty.

subitaneousness (sub-i-tā'nē-us-nes), n. Suddenness; hastiness.

subitany (sub-i-tā-ni), a. [< L. subitaneus, sudden; see subitaneous.] Sudden; hasty.

subito (sō'bi-tō), adv. [It., < L. subito, suddenly, abl. sing. neut. of subitus, sudden; see subitaneous, sudden.] In music, suddenly; quickly: as, volti subito (V. S.), turn (the leaf) quickly.

subj. An abbreviation of subjunctive.

subjacency (sub-jā'sen-si), n. [< subjacent (t) + -cy.] The state of being subjacent.

subjacent (sub-jā'sent), a. and n. [= F. subjacent = Pg. subjacente, < L. subjacent (t)-s, ppr. of subjacere, lie under or near or adjoin anything, < sub, under, + jacere, lie; see jacet. Cf. adjacent.] 1. a. 1. Lying under or below: in geol., applied to rocks, beds, or strata, considered with reference to their position beneath other overlying formations.—2. Being in a lower situation, though not necessarily directly beneath.

Between some breaches of the clouds we could see landscapes and villages of the subjacent country. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 2, 1644.

3. In alg., following below the line of the main characters: as, a subjacent letter, as the n in m_n.

II. n. In logic, the converting proposition or consequent of a conversion.

subject (sub'jekt), a. and n. [Now altered to suit the orig. L. form; < ME. subget, suget, suget, soget, < OF. suget, soget, souget, sujet, sujet, later sujet, F. sujet = Sp. sujeto, subjecto = Pg. sujeito = It. soggetto, soggetto, subject, as a noun (= G. subjekt), a subject (person or thing), < L. subjectus, lying under or near, adjacent, also subject, exposed, as a noun, subjectus, m., a subject, an inferior, subjectum, neut., the subject of a proposition, prop. pp. of subjicere, subicere, pp. subjectus, throw, lay, place, or bind under, subject, < sub, under, + jacere, throw; see jet. Cf. subjacent. Cf. abject, object, project.] 1. a. 1. Placed or situated under or beneath.

Long he them bore above the subject plaine. Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 19.

2. Being under the power or dominion of another.

For there nys God in heaven or helle, iwis, But he hath been right soget unto Love. Court of Love, l. 93.

Though in name an independent kingdom, she [Scotland] was during more than a century really treated, in many respects, as a subject province. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

3. Exposed; liable, from extraneous or inherent causes; prone: with to: as, a country subject to extreme heat or cold; a person subject to attacks of fever.

Most subject is the fattest soil to weeds. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4. 54.

My Lord, you are a great Prince, and all Eyes are upon your Actions; this makes you more subject to Envy. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 18.

A little knowledge is subject to make men headstrong, insolent, and untractable. Bp. Sprat, Hist. Royal Soc., p. 429.

Hence—4. Exposed or liable, as to what may confirm or modify: with to: as, subject to your approval; subject to correction.—5. Submissive; obedient. Tit, iii. 1.

No man was ever bidd subject to the Church of Corinth, Rome, or Asia, but to the Church without addition, as it held faithful to the rules of Scripture. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

Unless Love held them subject to the Will That gave them being, they would cease to be. Bryant, Order of Nature.

=Syn. 2. Subordinate, subservient, inferior.—3. Apt, Likely, etc. See apt.

II. n. 1. One who is placed under the authority, dominion, or controlling influence of another; specifically, one who owes allegiance to a sovereign and is governed by his laws; one who lives under the protection of, and owes allegiance to, a government.

And he leet make an Ymage in the lyknesse of his Fadre, and constryed alle his Subgettes for to worshipshe it. Mandeville, Travels, p. 41.

Tell his majesty I am a subject, and I do confess I serve a gracious prince. Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, ii. 1.

2. A person or thing regarded as the recipient of certain treatment; one who or that which is exposed or liable to something specified.

Alack, alack, that heaven should practise stratagems Upon so soft a subject as myself! Shak., R. and J., iii. 5. 212.

There is not a fairer subject for contempt and ridicule than a knave become the dupe of his own art. Sheridan, The Duenna, iii. 7.

The town bear [of Congleton] having died, it was ordered that certain monies . . . should be placed at the disposal of the bearward, to enable him to provide a new subject. Municip. Corp. Report, 1855, p. 2652.

Specifically—(a) A dead body used for dissection. (b) One who is peculiarly sensitive to psychological experimentation; a sensitive.

The monotonous ticking of a watch held to the ear will throw the nervous system of a sensitive subject into an abnormal state. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 251.

3. One who or that which is the cause or occasion of something.

I am the unhappy subject of these quarrels. Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 238.

Hear her, ye noble Romans! 'tis a woman; A subject not for swords, but pity. Fletcher, Valentinian, v. 8.

4. That on which any mental operation is performed; that which is thought, spoken, or treated of: as, a subject of discussion or negotiation; a subject for a sermon or a song; the subject of a story.

The matter or subject of Poesie . . . to myne intent is what soever wittie and delicate conceit of man meet or worthy to be put in written verse, for any necessary use of the present time, or good instruction of the posteritie. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 18.

O, sure I am, the wits of former days To subjects worse have given admiring praise. Shak., Sonnets, lix.

This subject for heroic song Pleased me. Milton, P. L., ix. 25.

But this, no more the subject of debate, Is past, forgotten, and resign'd to fate. Pope, Iliad, xix. 67.

5. In gram., that of which anything is affirmed; the nominative of a verb, without or with modifiers; the member or part of a sentence signifying that of which predication is made. A subject may be simple or compound; it may be a noun, or anything used with the value of a noun, whether word or phrase or clause: thus, that he has gone is true. A logical subject is one having the character of a subject according to the true meaning of the sentence; a grammatical subject is one having that character formally only: thus, in it is good to be here, it is the grammatical and to be here is the logical subject.

6. In logic, that term of a proposition of which the other is affirmed or denied. Thus, in the proposition "Plato was a philosopher," Plato is the logical subject, philosopher being its predicate, or that which is affirmed of the subject. Also, in the proposition "No man living on earth can be completely happy," man living on earth is the subject, and completely happy is the predicate, or that which is denied of the subject.

7. In metaph.: (a) A real thing to which given characters relate and in which they are said to inhere.

That which manifests its qualities—in other words, that in which the appearing causes inhere, that to which they belong—is called their subject, or substance, or substratum. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, viii.

(b) In Kantian and modern philosophy, the self or ego to which in all thought all mental representations are attributed (according to Kant); also, a real (hypothetical) thing in which mental phenomena are supposed to inhere. The word is commonly used by those psychologists who teach that the immediate consciousness of self (the subject) is an aspect or inseparable accompaniment of an immediate perception of an external object. The doctrine is that perception involves a sense of action and reaction (self and not-self). To this is often joined another proposition, that there is no mode of consciousness in which the opposition of subject and object does not appear. [Expressions very close to this meaning are to be found in pre-Kantian writers (see Leibnitz, Remarques sur le livre de M. King, § 20), but the word is in such passages used relatively, as in def. 6.]

In the first syllogism of transcendental psychology reason imposes upon us an apparent knowledge only, by representing the constant logical subject of thought as the knowledge of the real subject in which that knowledge inheres. Of that subject, however, we have not, and cannot have, the slightest knowledge, because consciousness is that which alone changes representations into thoughts, and in which, therefore, as the transcendental subject, all our perceptions must be found. Beside this logical meaning of the I, we have no knowledge of the subject in itself which forms the substratum and foundation of it and of all our thoughts.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller (Century ed.), II. 305.

The particular modes in which I now feel, desire, and think arise out of the modes in which I have previously done so; but the common characteristic of all these has been that in them a subject was conscious of itself as its own object, and thus self-determined.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 102.

The subject can be conscious of itself only in relation to an object which it at once excludes and determines.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 348, note.

8. In music: (a) In general, the theme or melodic phrase on which a work or movement is based, consisting of few or many tones variously combined and treated; a motive. When two or more principal subjects are used, they are often known as first, second, etc. (b) In contrapuntal works, the theme given out at the beginning, to which (in fugue and canon) the answer responds, and with which the counter-subject is combined which is taken as the basis for thematic development, for imitation, etc. In a fugue, the subject is also called antecedent, dux, proposita, etc.; in a canon, guida; and in freer contrapuntal music, cantus firmus or canto fermo.

9. In the fine arts, the plan or general view chosen by an artist; the design of a composition or picture; the scheme or idea of a work of art: as, a historical subject; a genre subject; a marine subject; a pastoral subject.—10. In decorative art, a pictorial representation of human figures or animals; a picture representing action and incident.

Vases painted with subjects after Watteau.

Soc. Arts Report, Exhib. 1867.

Diminished subject. See diminished.—First subject. See first.—Intervening subject. See intervening.—Inversion of subjects. See inversion.—Mixed subjects of property. See mixed.—Subject of inhesion, a thing in which characters inhere.—Subject of predication, the subject of a proposition.—Subject of relation, that one of the correlates to which the others are referred as secondary; the relate.—To be in a subject, to be related to any thing somewhat as a predicate is related to its subject; to exist by virtue of that subject of which the attribute which is in the subject does not form a part.—Syn. 4. Subject, Theme, Topic, Point, Thesis. The first three of these words are often popularly used as exactly synonymous. Daniel Webster puts within a few lines of each other the two following sentences: [If an American Thucydides should arise,] "may his theme not be a Peloponnesian war," and [American history] "will furnish no topic for a Gibbon." Yet, strictly in rhetoric, and more often in general use, subject is the broad word for anything written or spoken about, while theme is the word for the exact and generally narrower statement of the subject. A topic is a still narrower subject; there may be several interesting topics suggested under a single subject. A point is by its primary meaning the smallest possible subdivision under a subject. Thesis is a technical word for a subject which takes the form of an exact proposition or assertion which is to be proved; as, Luther fastened his ninety-five theses to the church-door. The paper in which the proof of a thesis is attempted is also called a thesis. A student's composition is often called a theme. The meaning of the other words is not extended to the written or spoken discourse. See proposition.

subject (sub-jekt'), v. [Now altered to suit the orig. L. form; < ME. sugetten, < OF. sujeter* = Sp. subjetar, subjetar, sujetar = Pg. subjetar = It. suggettare, soggettare, subject, < ML. subjec-tare, subject, freq. of L. subjicere, subicere, throw under: see subject, a. and n.] I. trans. 1. To put, lay, or spread under; make subject.

In one short view subjected to our eye,
Gods, Emperors, Heroes, Sages, Beauties lie.

Pope, To Addison, l. 33.
The lands that lie
Subjected to the Heliconian ridge.

Tennyson, Tiresias.

2. To expose; make liable or obnoxious: with to: as, credulity subjects one to impositions.

Subject himself to anarchy within,
Or lawless passions in him, which he serves.

Milton, P. R., ii. 471.

If the vessels yield, it subjects the person to all the inconveniences of an erroneous circulation. Arbuthnot.

3. To submit; make accountable, subservient, or the like; cause to undergo; expose, as in chemical or other operations: with to: as, to subject clay to a white heat.

Subjected to his service angel-wings.

Milton, P. L., ix. 155.

God is not bound to subject his ways of operation to the scrutiny of our thoughts. Locke.

Church discipline [in Germany] was subjected to State approval; and a power of expelling rebellious clergy from the country was established.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 569.

No gas is "atomic" in the chemist's sense, except when subjected to the action of electricity, or, in the case of hydrogen, to a high temperature.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 144.

4. To bring under power, dominion, or sway; subdue; subordinate.

High Ioue permits the sunne to cast his beames,
And the moyst cloudes to drop downe pteuous streames,
Alike vpon the just & reprobate;
Yet are not both subjected by one fate?

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Neither God nor the Lawes have subjected us to his will, nor sett his reason to be our Sovran above Law.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xi.

II. † intrans. To be or become subject.

When men freely subject to any lust as a new master.

T. Brooks, Works, II. 242.

subjectable (sub-jek'ta-bl), a. [< subject + -able.] To be subjected or submitted. [Rare.] It was propounded to these fathers confessors as a thing not subjectable to their penitential judicature.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 106.

subjectdom (sub-jekt-dum), n. [< subject + -dom.] The state or condition of being a subject.

No clue to its nationality, except in the political sense of subjectdom, therefore is available.

Greenwell, British Barrows, p. 608. (Encyc. Dict.)

subjection (sub-jek'shon), n. [< ME. subjection, subjection, subjeccioun, < OF. (and F.) subjection = Sp. subjeccion = Pg. sujeição, sogeição = It. suggestione, soggezione, < L. subiectio(n)-, a placing under, substitution, reducing to obedience, subjection, < subjicere, subicere, throw under, subject: see subject, v.] 1. The act of subjecting or subduing; the act of vanquishing and bringing under the dominion of another.

The prophesie seith that the grete dragon shall come fro Rome that wolde distroie the reame of the grete Breteyne and put it in his subjection.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 433.

King Arthur . . . sailed with his fleet into Island, and brought it and the people thereof vnder his subjection.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 1.

After the conquest of the kingdom, and subjection of the rebels, enquiry was made who they were that, fighting against the king, had saved themselves by flight.

Sir M. Hale.

2. The state of being in the power or under the control or domination of another; service.

Thei that marchen upon zou schulle ben undre zoure Subieccioun, as zee han ben undre hires.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 225.

Both in subjection now

To sensual appetite. Milton, P. L., ix. 1128.

A lofty mind,

By philosophic discipline prepared

For calm subjection to acknowledged law.

Wordsworth, Excursion, iii.

3. In logic, the act of attaching a subject to a predicate: corresponding to predication.

subjective (sub-jek'tiv), a. [= F. subjectif = Sp. subjetivo = G. subjektiv, < L. subjectivus, of or pertaining to a subject, < subjectum, a subject: see subject, n.] 1. Relating to or of the nature of a subject, as opposed to an object. In the older writers subjective is nearly synonymous with real, and still more closely so with the common modern meaning of objective. By Kant, following some of his earlier contemporaries, the word was restricted to the subject of thought, or the ego. See objective.

Certainty, according to the schools, is distinguished into objective and subjective. Objective certainty is when the proposition is certainly true in itself, and subjective when we are certain of the truth of it. The one is in things, the other is in our minds.

Watts, Logic, II. ii. § 8.

The words subjective and objective are getting into general use now.

E. Fitzgerald, Letter, Mar. 21, 1841 (in Lit. Remains, I. 71).

The uncivilized or semi-civilized man is wholly unable to think of the maniac's visions as subjective illusions.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 124.

All knowledge on its subjective side is belief.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 434.

2. In literature and art, noting a production characterized by the prominence given to the individuality of the author or artist: as, the subjective school of painting; also, relating to such individuality. The writings of Shelley and Byron are essentially subjective, while the novels of Scott are objective.

They [the Iliad and Odyssey] are so purely objective that they seem projected, as it were, into this visible diurnal sphere with hardly a subjective trace adhering to them, and are silent as the stars concerning their own genesis and mutual relation.

W. D. Geddes.

I am disposed to consider the Sonnets from the Portuguese as . . . a portion of the finest subjective poetry in our literature.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 137.

3. Relating to a subject in a political sense; submissive; obedient. [A rare and irregular use.]

What eye can look, through clear love's spectacle,

On virtue's majesty that shines in beauty,

But, as to nature's divin' miracle,

Performs not to it all subjective duty?

Sir J. Davies, Witte's Pilgrimage, sig. D. 2. (Latham.)

Which sadly when they saw

How those had sped before, with most subjective awe
Submit them to his sword. Drayton, Polyolbion, xi. 376.

Subjective certainty. See certainty.—Subjective colors. Same as accidental colors (which see, under accidental).—Subjective doubt, end, ens. See the nouns.

—Subjective idealism. Same as Fichtean idealism (which see, under idealism).—Subjective method, power, reason, etc. See the nouns.—Subjective part. See extension, 5.—Subjective perspective, a method of representation which looks right, though it is geometrically false. This method is, in fact, usually practised by painters who greatly exaggerate certain effects of perspective, as if the picture were intended to be seen from a point of view much nearer than that usually chosen by the spectator, and are then obliged to modify certain consequences of this exaggeration.—Subjective sensation, a sensation which is not caused by an object outside of the body.

—Subjective symptoms, in pathol., symptoms, as sensations, appreciable by the patient, but not discernible by another observer.

subjectively (sub-jek'tiv-li), adv. In a subjective manner; in relation to the subject; as existing in a subject or mind. I do not see how we can successfully guard against the danger of considering as both objectively and subjectively evident things which, in fact, are only subjectively evident.

Mivart, Nature and Thought, p. 58.

subjectiveness (sub-jek'tiv-nes), n. The state of being subjective; subjectivity.

subjectivism (sub-jek'tiv-izm), n. [< subjective + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that we can immediately know only what is present to consciousness. Those who adhere to this opinion either regard it as axiomatic, or fortify it by arguments analogous to those by which Zeno sought to prove that a particle can have only position, and not velocity, at any instant—arguments which appear, upon logical analysis, to beg the question. Those who oppose the opinion maintain that it would lead to the absurd corollary that there can be no cognition whatever, not even of a problematical or interrogatory kind, concerning anything but the immediate present.

The philosophical principle of subjectivism.

Ueberweg, Hist. Philosophy (trans. by Morris), I.

2. The doctrine, sometimes termed relativism, that "man is the measure of things"—that is, that the truth is nothing but each man's settled opinion, there being no objective criterion of truth at all. This is an opinion held by some English philosophers, as well as by Protagoras in antiquity. It is a modification of subjectivism in sense 1, above.

3. Same as subjectivity, 3.

subjectivist (sub-jek'tiv-ist), n. and a. [< subjective + -ist.] I. n. In metaph., one who holds the doctrine or doctrines of subjectivism.

II. a. Same as subjectivistic.—Subjectivist logic. See logic.

subjectivistic (sub-jek-ti-vis'tik), a. [< subjectivist + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by subjectivism.

subjectivistically (sub-jek-ti-vis'ti-kal-i), adv. With subjectivistic reasoning; from the point of view of subjectivism.

subjectivity (sub-jek'tiv'i-ti), n. [= F. subjectivité = G. subjektivität, < NL. subjectivita(t)-s, < L. subjectivus, subjective: see subjective.] 1. The absence of objective reality; illusiveness; the character of arising within the mind, as, for example, the sensation of a color does.

We must, in the first place, remember that analysis and subjectivity on the one hand, and synthesis and objectivity on the other hand, go together in Kant's mind.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 413.

Belief in the subjectivity of time, space, and other forms of thought inevitably involves Agnosticism.

J. Martineau, Mind, XIII. 596.

2. The private, arbitrary, and limited element of self; that which is peculiar to an individual mind: as, the subjectivity of Byron or Shelley.

There are two ways of looking at subjectivity. We may understand by it, in the first place, only the natural and finite subjectivity, with its contingent and arbitrary content of particular interests and inclinations. . . . In this sense of subjectivity, we cannot help admiring the tranquil resignation of the ancients to destiny, and feeling that it is a much higher and worthier mood than that of the moderns, who obstinately pursue their subjective aims, and when they find themselves constrained to give up the hope of reaching them, console themselves with the prospect of a reward in some shape or other. But the term subjectivity is not to be confined merely to the bad and finite kind of it which is contradistinguished from the fact. In its truth subjectivity is immanent in the fact, and as a subjectivity thus infinite is the very truth of the fact. . . . Christianity, we know, teaches that God wishes all men to be saved. That teaching declares that subjectivity has an infinite value.

Hegel, Henning's notes of his lectures, tr. in Wallace's Logic of Hegel, § 147.

It is surely subjectivity and interiority which are the notions latest acquired by the human mind.

W. James, Prin. of Psychology, II. 43.

subjectivize (sub'jekt-iv-iz), v. [< subjective + -ize.] To render subjective; to bring into the subjective state.

subjectless (sub'jekt-less), a. [< subject + -less.] Having no subject or subjects.

... subject without the king can do nothing; the subject can do something. Carlyle.

subject-matter (sub'jekt-mat'ér), n. The subject or matter presented for consideration in some written or oral statement or discussion.

It is catalogued as disposed according to the Subject Matter of the Books, as the Bibles and Expositors, Historians, Philosophers, &c. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 107.

subjectness (sub'jekt-nes), n. The state or condition of being subject; subjection. [Rare.]

subject-notion (sub'jekt-nō'shən), n. A concept or notion the subject of a judgment.

subject-object (sub'jekt-ob'jekt), n. The immediate object of cognition, or the thought itself, as distinguished from the object-object, or unknown real object. [In Kantian terminology, the Gegenstand, as distinguished from the Objekt.]

subjectship (sub'jekt-ship), n. [< subject + -ship.] The state of being subject or a subject. [Rare.]

The subjectship, being the very relation in which the creature stands to the Creator as his lawgiver, ruler, and judge. Candlish, The Fatherhood of God, I. 54.

subjecture (sub'jekt-tūr), n. [< subject + -ure.] The state of being subject; subjection. [Rare.]

subjee (sub'jē), n. [Hind. sabzi, the larger leaves and capsules of the hemp-plant, also greenness, greens, < sabza, greenness, verdure, the hemp-plant.] The larger leaves and capsules of the Indian hemp without the stalks. See bhang.

subjicibility (sub-jis-i-bil'i-ti), n. [< ML. subjicibilis (t-s), < subjicibilis: see subjicible.] Capability of being a subject of predication.

subjicible (sub-jis'i-bl), a. [< ML. subjicibilis, subjicible, < L. subjicere, subjicere, place under, subject: see subject.] 1. Capable of being subjected. [Rare.]

He [Jesus] was not a person subjicible to a command; it was enough that he understood the inclinations and designs of his Father's mercies. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 56.

2. Capable of being made the subject of something else as predicate.

subjoin (sub-join'), v. t. [< OF. subjoindre, < L. subungere, add, annex, yoke, < sub, under, + ungere, join, yoke: see join.] To add at the end, especially of something said or written; annex; append: as, to subjoin an argument or an illustration.

I shall subjoin, as a Corollary to the foregoing Remark, an admirable Observation out of Aristotle. Addison, Spectator, No. 273.

—Syn. To ally, attach.
subjoiner (sub-join'ér), n. [< OF. subjoindre, subjoin, inf. used as a noun: see subjoin.] A remark following or subjoined to another; a rejoinder. [Rare.]

"I will never stand to be hissed," was the subjoiner of young Confidence. Lamb, Ellistonia.

subjoint (sub'join), n. In zool., a subsidiary or secondary joint; one of the subdivisions, often very numerous, of the regular joints of an insect's or a crustacean's legs, antennae, etc. Thus, the fore legs of a pedipalp arachnid, or the antennae of a lobster, have numerous subjoints in the long, slender, lash-like part of the organ beyond the short and stout joints that are identified by name. See Phragma. Also called subsegment.

sub judice (sub jō'di-sē), [L.: sub, under; judice, abl. sing. of judex, judge: see judgc.] Before the judge; under judicial consideration; not yet decided.

The relations of the people and the crown were then [Freign of James I.] brought to issue, and, under shifting names, continued sub judice from that time to 1688. De Quincey, Rhetoric.

subjugable (sub'jō-ga-bl), a. [< L. as if subjugabilis*, < subjugare, subjugate: see subjugate.] That may be subjugated; capable of being subdued or conquered.

An abundance of good, readily subjugable land awaiting the plow. Science, VII. 232.

subjugal (sub-jō'gal), a. [< L. sub, under, + E. jugal.] Situated below the jugal, malar, or zygomatic bone.

subjugate (sub'jō-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. subjugated, subjugating. [< L. subjugatus, pp. of subjugare, < sub, under, + jugare, < Sp. subyugar, < L. subjugare, < E. subjugare, bring under, yoke: see yoke.] 1. To bring under the yoke; subdue; conquer; compel to submit to the domination or control of another; vanquish.

He subjugated a king, and called him his vassal. Baker.

In a few months he [Cromwell] subjugated Ireland as Ireland had never been subjugated during the five centuries of slaughter which had elapsed since the landing of the first Norman settlers. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., I.

2. To make subservient; take or hold captive; bring under bondage, as the senses.

Mans sence captiv'de, his reason subjugate. Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 109.

I understood that unto such a torment
The carnal malefactors were condemned
Who reason subjugate to appetite.
Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, v. 39.

—Syn. 1. Vanquish, Subdue, etc. See conquer.

subjugation (sub'jō-gā'shən), n. [= F. subjugation, < ML. subjugatio(n), < L. subjugare, subjugate: see subjugate.] The act of subjugating, or the state of being subjugated; subjection.

Her policy was military because her objects were power, ascendancy, and subjugation.

D. Webster, Speech at Plymouth, Dec. 22, 1820.

The subjugation of virgin soil, as we had occasion to notice, is a serious work.

E. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 348.

subjugator (sub'jō-gā-tor), n. [= F. subjuteur = Pg. subjogador, < LL. subjugator, one who subjugates, a conqueror, < subjugare, subjugate: see subjugate.] One who subjugates or enslaves; a conqueror. Coleridge.

subjunction (sub-jungk'shən), n. [< L. as if subjunctio(n)*, < subjungere, add, subjoin: see subjoin.] The act of subjoining, or the state of being subjoined; also, something subjoined.

subjunctive (sub-jungk'tiv), a. and n. [= F. subjunctif = Sp. subjuntivo = Pg. subjunctivo = It. subjuntivo, < L. subjunctivus, serving to join, connecting, in gram., sc. modus, the subjunctive mode, < subjungere, pp. subjunctus, add, join, subjoin: see subjoin.] 1. a. 1. Subjoined or added to something before said or written.

A few things more, subjunctive to the former, were thought meet to be castigated in preachers at that time.

Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, p. 87. (Latham.)

2. In gram., noting that mode of the verb by which is expressed condition, hypothesis, or contingency, and which is generally used in a clause subjoined or subordinate to another clause or verb, and preceded by one of certain conjunctions, especially (in English) if or though: as in the sentence "if that be the case, then I am wrong." The subjunctive mode was an original part of the inflection of Indo-European verbs, and is preserved in most of the existing languages of the family; but be and were are the only remaining forms in English in which it is conspicuously distinguished from the indicative. Abbreviated subj.

II. n. In gram., the subjunctive mode.

The subjunctive is evidently passing out of use, and there is good reason to suppose that it will soon become obsolete altogether.

Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xiv.

subkingdom (sub'king'dum), n. 1. A prime subdivision of the animal kingdom; a superclass corresponding to the "branches" or "embranchements" of French zoologists, as Cuvier, who recognized the four subkingdoms of the vertebrates, mollusks, articulate, and radiates. Such main groups are now more commonly called phyla. Eight such groups now very generally recognized, in fact if not in name, are Protozoa, Coelentera, Echinodermata, Vermes, Arthropoda, Molluscoidea, Mollusca, and Vertebrata. Some authors degrade Vermes from this rank, or otherwise dispose of it as a subkingdom; some elevate the Tunicata to this rank; and the Molluscoidea are not recognized by all as a subkingdom.

The prolific animals of the fifth day's creation belonged to the three Cuvierian subkingdoms of the Radiata, Articulate, and Mollusca, and to the classes of Fish and Reptiles among the Vertebrata.

Darwin, Origin of World, p. 213.

2. In bot., a primary division of the vegetable kingdom; the highest class below the kingdom itself. The ordinary division is into two such subkingdoms, the Phanerogamia and the Cryptogamia; but late systematists incline to recognize four: Spermatophyta (corresponding to the Phanerogamia), Pteridophyta, Bryophyta, and Thallophyta (corresponding to Cryptogamia).

sublacunose (sub-lā-kū'nōs), a. Somewhat lacunose.

Convergent to a sublacunose centre. Encyc. Nat. Hist. (1855), III. 580.

sublanate (sub-lā'nāt), a. In bot., somewhat lanate or woolly.

sublanceolate (sub-lan'sē-ō-lāt), a. In zool., and bot., approaching the lanceolate form; somewhat tapering and pointed.

sublapsarian (sub-lap-sā'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. sub, under, + lapsus, fall (see lapse), + -arian.] 1. a. Relating to the sublapsarian or to their tenets.

According to the sublapsarian doctrine. Hammond.

II. n. One who believes in sublapsarianism. Compare supralapsarian.

sublapsarianism (sub-lap-sā'ri-an-izm), n. [< sublapsarian + -ism.] The doctrine that the decrees of election and reprobation are subsequent to the fall, or that men are elected to grace or reprobated to death while in a state of sin and ruin.

sublapsary (sub-lap'sā-ri), a. and n. Same as sublapsarian.

sublate (sub-lāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublated, ppr. sublating. [< L. sublatius, used as pp. of tolere, raise, take up, < sub, under, from under, + latus, used as pp. of ferre, bear.] 1. To take or carry away; remove. [Rare.]

The authoress of ye mischiefe [were] sublated & plucked away. Hall, Hen. VII., an. 1.

2. In logic, to deny: opposed to posit.

Where . . . the propositional lines are of uniform breadth, it is hereby shewn that all such opposition is sublated. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, II. 471.

3. In Hegelian logic, to cancel by a subsequent movement.

The process of the external world left to itself in its externality can only be to go into itself, or to sublate or remove its own externality. Craig, Hegel, p. 198.

sublation (sub-lā'shən), n. [< L. sublatio(n), a raising, removal, < sublatius, raised, taken away: see sublate.] 1. The act of taking or carrying away. [Rare.]

He could not be forsaken by a sublation of union. Ep. Hall, Remains, p. 188.

2. Cancellation by a subsequent logical movement, in Hegelian philosophy.

sublative (sub-lā'tiv), a. [< sublate + -ive.] Tending to take away or deprive.

sublease (sub-lēs), n. In law, an under-lease; a lease granted by one who is himself a lessee or tenant. For some purposes, a sublease for the entire remaining term of the lessor is deemed an assignment rather than a sublease.

sublease (sub-lēs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. subleased, ppr. subleasing. To underlease.

He leased his house, . . . and subleased part of it. New York Evening Post, March 3, 1886.

sublessee (sub'le-sē'), n. The receiver or holder of a sublease.

sublessor (sub-les'or), n. The grantor of a sublease.

sublet (sub-let'), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublet, ppr. subletting. To underlet; let to another person, the party letting being himself lessee or tenant.

He's let and sublet, and every man has to make something out of him [the convict] each time. The Century, XL. 221.

sublevaminous (sub-lē-vam'i-nus), a. [< ML. sublevamen (-min-), a lifting, supporting, < L. sublevare, lift, support: see sublevate.] Supporting; upholding.

His up-holding and sublevaminous Providence. Feltham, Resolves, II. 2.

sublevate (sub-lē-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublevated, ppr. sublevating. [< L. sublevatus, pp. of sublevare (> It. sollevare = Pg. Sp. sublevar), lift up from beneath, < sub, under, + levare, lift up, raise, < levis, light.] To raise; elevate; excite. Formerly also sollevate.

sublevation (sub-lē-vā'shən), n. [= Sp. sublevación = Pg. sollevazione, < L. sublevatio(n), a lightening, < sublevare, pp. sublevatus, lift up from beneath, support: see sublevate.] 1. The act of lifting or raising; elevation.—2. A rising or insurrection.

Any general commotion or sublevation of the people. Sir W. Temple, Works (ed. 1731), II. 566.

sublicense (sub-li'sens), v. t. To underlicense; license to another person under the provisions of a license already held by the person so licensing.

sublieutenant (sub'lū-ten'ant), n. In the British navy, a grade immediately below that of lieutenant. Formerly called mate.

subligation (sub-li-gā'shən), n. [< LL. subligatio(n), a binding below, < L. subligare, pp. subligatus, bind below, < sub, under, + ligare, tie, bind: see ligation.] The act of binding underneath. [Rare.]

sublimable (sub-li'mā-bl), a. [< sublime + -able.] Capable of being sublimated. See sublimation. Boyle, Works, III. 57.

sublimableness (sub-li'mā-bl-nes), n. The quality of being sublimable. Boyle, Works, I. 573.

sublimary (sub-li-mā-ri), a. [< sublime + -ary.] Elevated. [Rare.]

First to the master of the feast
This health is consecrated,
Thence to each sublimary guest
Whose soul doth desire
This nectar to raise and inspire.
A. Brome, The Painter's Entertainment.

sublimate (sub'li-māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublimated, ppr. sublimating. [< L. sublimatus, pp. of sublimare, lift up on high, raise; see sublime, v.] 1. To bring (a solid substance, such as camphor or sulphur) by heat into the state of vapor, which on cooling returns again to the solid state. See sublimation.—2. To extract by or as by sublimation.

It will be a harder alchemy than Lullius ever knew to sublimat any good use out of such an invention.

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 13.

You that have put so fair for the philosopher's stone that you have endeavoured to sublimat it out of poor men's bones ground to powder by your oppressions.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 380.

3. Figuratively, to deprive of earthly dross; elevate; refine; purify; idealize.

And when [the Sultan is] in state, there is not in the world to be seen a greater spectacle of humane glory, and of sublimated manhood.

Sauvages, Traavaux, p. 79.

I can conceive nothing more sublimating than the strange peril and novelty of an adventure such as this.

Poe, Tales, I. 97.

The atmosphere was light, odor, music; and each and all sublimated beyond anything the sober senses are capable of receiving.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 139.

sublimate (sub'li-māt as adj., -māt as noun), a. and n. [< L. sublimatus, pp. of sublimare, lift on high; see sublimate, v.] 1. a. Brought into a state of vapor by heat, and again condensed, as camphor, sulphur, etc.; hence, elevated; purified.

Offering her selfe more sublimat and pure, in the sacred name and rites of Religion.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 366.

II. n. 1. Anything produced by sublimation or refining.—2. In mineral, the deposit formed, as in a glass tube or on a surface of charcoal, when a mineral containing a volatile ingredient is heated before the blowpipe.—Blue sublimate, a preparation of mercury in combination with flowers of sulphur and sal ammoniac, used in painting. Corrosive sublimate. See corrosive.

sublimation (sub-li-mā'shən), n. [< ME. sublimacion, < OF. (and F.) sublimation = Sp. sublimación = Pg. sublimação = It. sublimazione, < LL. sublimatio(n-), a lifting up, a deliverance, < L. sublimare, lift up; see sublimate, sublime, v.] 1. In chem., the act or process of sublimating; a process by which solid substances are, by the aid of heat, converted into vapor, which is again condensed into the solid state by the application of cold.

Sublimation effects for solids to some extent what distillation effects for liquids. Both processes purify the substances to which they are severally applied, by separating them from the fixed matters with which they are associated. Sublimation is usually conducted in one vessel, the product being deposited in the upper part of the vessel in a solid state, and often in the crystalline form, while the impurity remains in the lower part. The vapors of some substances which undergo the process of sublimation condense in the form of a fine powder called flowers; such are the flowers of sulphur, flowers of benzoin, etc. Other sublimates are obtained in a solid and compact form, as camphor, ammonium chlorid, and all the sublimates of mercury.

The quint essencia therof is naturally incorruptible, the which ge schal drawe out by sublimacion.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 4.

2. The act of heightening, refining, purifying, or freeing (something) from baser qualities; as, the sublimation of the affections.—3. That which has been highly refined or purified; hence, the highest product of anything.

Religion is the perfection, refinement, and sublimation of morality.

South.

His verse was the sublimation of his rarest mood.

Stedman, Poets of America, p. 178.

Sublimation theory, in geol. and mining, the theory according to which ore-deposits were formed and vein-fissures filled by the volatilization of metalliferous matter from beneath, or from the ignited interior of the earth.

sublimatory (sub'li-mā-tō-ri), a. and n. [< ME. sublimatory = F. sublimatoire, < LL. sublimator, a lifter, < L. sublimare, lift up; see sublimate, v.] 1. a. Tending to sublimatize; used in sublimation.

II. n.; pl. sublimatories (-riz). A vessel for sublimation.

Violes, crosettes, and sublimatories.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, I. 240.

sublime (sub-lim'), a. and n. [= F. sublime = Sp. Pg. It. sublime, < L. sublimis, uplifted, high, lofty, sublime; origin unknown.] 1. a. 1. High in place; uplifted; elevated; exalted; lofty.

Lie to thy selfe, pursue not after Fame; Thunders at the sublimest buildings aime.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 532.

Sublime on these a tow'r of steel is rear'd.

Dryden, Æneid, vi. 748.

2. High in excellence; elevated by nature; exalted above men in general by lofty or noble traits; eminent: said of persons.

The age was fruitful in great men, but amongst them all, if we except the sublime Julian leader, none, as regards splendour of endowments, stood upon the same level as Cicero.

De Quincey, Cicero.

Here dwells no perfect man sublime,
Nor woman winged before her time.

Whittier, Last Walk in Autumn.

3. Striking the mind with a sense of grandeur or power, physical or moral; calculated to awaken awe, veneration, exalted or heroic feeling, and the like; lofty; grand; noble: noting a natural object or scenery, an action or conduct, a discourse, a work of man's hands, a spectacle, etc.: as, sublime scenery; sublime heroism.

Easy in Words thy Style, in Sense sublime.
Prior, To Dr. Sherlock.

Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong.

Longfellow, Light of Stars.

The forms of elevated masses that are most sublime are the lofty and precipitous, as implying the most intense effort of supporting might.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 238.

Dinah, covered with her long white dress, her pale face full of subdued emotion, almost like a lovely corpse into which the soul has returned charged with sublimer secrets and a sublimer love.

George Eliot, Adam Bede, xv.

4. Of lofty mien; elevated in manner, expression, or appearance.

His fair large front and eye sublime declared Absolute rule.

Milton, P. L., iv. 300.

For the proud Souldan, with presumptuous cheare
And countenance sublime and insolent, Sought only slaughter and avengement.

Spenser, F. Q., V. viii. 30.

5. In anat., superficial; not deep-seated: opposed to profound: as, the sublime flexor of the fingers (the flexor sublimis, a muscle).—Sublime geometry, the theory of higher curves.—Sublime Porte. See Porte.—Syn. 2 and 3. Grand, Lofty, Sublime, majestic, stately. Grand founds its meanings on the idea of great size, lofty and sublime on that of height. Natural objects may be sublime without physical height, if vastness and great impressiveness are present. In the moral field the sublime is that which is so high above ordinary human achievements as to give the impression of astonishment blended with awe, as the leap of Curtius into the chasm, or the death of the martyr Stephen. In moral things the grand suggests both vastness and elevation. Lofty may imply pride, but in this connection it notes only a lower degree of the sublime, sublime being the strongest word in the language for ideas of its class.

II. n. That which is sublime: commonly with the definite article. (a) In lit., that which is most elevated, stately, or imposing in style.

The sublime rises from the nobleness of thoughts, the magnificence of words, or the harmonious and lively turn of the phrase.

Addison.

The origin of the sublime is one of the most curious and interesting subjects of inquiry that can occupy the attention of a critic.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

(b) The grand, impressive, and awe-inspiring in the works of nature or art, as distinguished from the beautiful: occasionally with the indefinite article, to express a particular character of sublimity.

There is a sublime in nature, as in the ocean or the thunder—in moral action, as in deeds of daring and self-denial—and in art, as in statuary and painting, by which what is sublime in nature and in moral character is represented and idealized.

Fleming, Vocab. Philos.

(c) That which has been elevated and sublimated to its extreme limit; a noble and exalted ideal.

Your upward gaze at me now is the very sublimity of faith, truth, and devotion.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxv.

Are you—poor, sick, old ere your time—
Nearer one whit your own sublime

Than we who never have turned a rhyme?

Browning, The Last Ride Together.

sublime (sub-lim'), v.; pret. and pp. sublimed, ppr. subliming. [< ME. sublimen, < OF. sublimier = Sp. Pg. sublimar = It. sublimare, < L. sublimare, raise on high, in ML. also sublimare, < sublimis, raised on high, sublime; see sublime, a.] 1. trans. 1. To raise on high.

Thou dear vine, . . .

Although thy trunk be neither large nor strong,
Nor can thy head (not help'd) itself sublime,
Yet, like a serpent, a tall tree can climb.

Sir J. Denham, Old Age, iii.

One mind has climbed
Step after step, by just ascent sublimed.

Browning, Sordello.

2. To sublimatize.

Th' austere and ponderous juices they sublime
Make them ascend the porous soil and climb
The orange tree, the citron, and the lime.

Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, ii. 234.

Sub. How do you sublimat him?
Face. With the Calce of Egg-shells.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 5.

3. To elevate; refine; purify; etherealize.

Sublimed thee, and exalted thee, and fixed thee
In the third region, called our state of grace?

B. Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

I am sublimed! gross earth,
Support me not! I walk on air!

Massinger, City Madam, iii. 3.

Our Dross but weighs us down into Despair,
While their sublimed spirits dance i' th' Ayre.

Brome, Jovial Crew, ii.

A judicious use of metaphors wonderfully raises, sublimates, and adorns oratory or elocution.

Goldsmith, Metaphors.

II. intrans. 1. To be affected by sublimation; be brought or changed into a state of vapor by heat, and then condensed by cold, as camphor or sulphur.

Particles of antimony which will not sublime alone.

Newton, Opticks, iii, query 31.

Different bodies sublime at different temperatures, according to their various degrees of volatility.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 203.

2. To become exalted as by sublimation.

This new faith subliming into knowledge.

E. H. Sears, The Fourth Gospel, p. 172.

Sublimed sulphur. Same as flowers of sulphur. See sulphur.

sublimely (sub-lim'li), adv. In a sublime manner; with exalted conceptions; loftily.

In English lays, and all sublimely great,
Thy Homer warms with all his ancient heat.

Farnell, To Pope.

sublimeness (sub-lim'nes), n. The condition or quality of being sublime; loftiness of sentiment or style; sublimity.

sublimier (sub-li'mér), n. [< sublime, v., + -er 1.] One who or that which sublimates; specifically, an apparatus for performing the operation of sublimation. Sublimiers are of various forms and materials, according to their special requirements, but each consists essentially of an inclosure of metal, earthenware, or glass, to which heat may be applied, and a condenser or collector for the sublimed substance.

sublimette (sub-li-met'), n. [< F. sublime, high (see sublime), + dim. -ette.] A variety of music-box.

sublimification (sub-lim'i-fi-kā'shən), n. [< L. sublimis, sublime, + facere, do, make (see -fy), + -ation.] The act of making sublime, or the state of being made sublime.

subliminal (sub-lim'i-nal), a. [< L. sub, under, + limen (limin-), threshold.] Below the threshold of sensation. In the following quotation a similar threshold of consciousness is supposed.

As attention moves away from a presentation its intensity diminishes, and when the presentation is below the threshold of consciousness its intensity is then subliminal, whatever that of the physical stimulus may be.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 49.

sublimitation (sub-lim-i-tā'shən), n. A subordinate or secondary limitation. De Quincey, Style, iii.

sublimity (sub-lim'i-ti), n.; pl. sublimities (-tiz). [< F. sublimité = Sp. sublimitad = Pg. sublimitade = It. sublimità, < L. sublimita(t)-s, loftiness, elevation, < sublimis, raised on high, sublime; see sublime.] 1. The state of being sublime; that character or quality of anything which marks it as sublime; grandeur. Especially—

(a) Loftiness of nature or character; moral grandeur: as, the sublimity of an action.

The sublimity of the character of Christ owes nothing to his historians.

Buckminster.

(b) Loftiness of conception; exaltation of sentiment or style.

Milton's chief talent, and, indeed, his distinguishing excellence, lies in the sublimity of his thoughts.

Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

(c) Grandeur; vastness; majesty, whether exhibited in the works of nature or of art: as, the sublimity of a scene or of a building.

It seems manifest that the most perfect realization of structural beauty and sublimity possible to music is attained by instrumental composition.

J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 217.

There is also the sensation of great magnitude, corresponding to the voluminous in sound, and lying at the foundation of what we term sublimity.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 217.

2. That which is sublime; a sublime person or thing.

The particle of those sublimities
Which have relapsed to chaos.

Byron, Child Harold, iv. 54.

3. The highest degree of its highest quality of which anything is capable; climax; acme.

The sublimity of wisdom is to do those things living which are to be desired when dying.

Jer. Taylor.

Extensive, intensive, etc., sublimity. See the adjectives.—Syn. 1. See sublime.

sublinear (sub-lin'ē-ār), a. Nearly linear.

Suture sublinear above and slightly channeled below.

Amer. Nat., XXII. 1017.

sublingua (sub-ling'gwā), n.; pl. sublinguæ (-gwæ). [NL. (cf. LL. sublinguam, the epiglottis), < L. sub, under, + lingua, the tongue.] A process of the mucous membrane of the floor of the mouth developed between the tip of the tongue and the symphysis of the lower jaw of some animals, as lemurs; it may acquire consublingual, and become differentiated or pec-

... as also in the platy-

... is a process below the tongue which is

... is the so-called sublingua.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 553.

sublingual (sub-līng'wāl), a. [= F. sublingual, ass. + lingual.] 1. Situated under the tongue, or on the under side of the tongue; hypoglossal; specifying various structures. Also sublingual. 2. Of or pertaining to the sublingual.

Sublingual artery, a branch of bifurcation of the lingual artery, arising with the ramus opposite the margin of the hyoglossus muscle, and running on the geniohyoglossus to the sublingual gland. Sublingual calculus, a salivary calculus of the sublingual gland. Sublingual cyst. Same as ranula. Sublingual fossa, a shallow cavity on the inner surface of the inferior maxillary bone above the mylohyoid ridge, and near the symphysis menti, partly lodging the sublingual gland. Sublingual gland, the smallest salivary gland, lying on the floor of the mouth, discharging by a series of ducts (eight to twenty—the ducts of Rivini) either freely into the mouth or into the duct of Wharton. The longest duct, running along Wharton's duct, and opening with or very near it, is called the duct of Bartholin. See cut under salivary. Sublingual process, the sublingua.

sublition (sub-līsh'ōn), n. [L. as if sublitione*], < sublino, pp. sublatus, anoint beneath, lay on as a ground-color, prime, < sub, under, + linere, smear; see liniment.] In painting, the act or art of laying the ground-color under the perfect color.

sublittoral (sub-lit'ō-rāl), a. In zool., of littoral habits to some extent; living near the seashore; especially, living at a somewhat lower horizon under water than that of the littoral zone.

sublobular (sub-lob'ū-lār), a. Situated beneath a lobule. Compare interlobular and intra-lobular.

The intralobular vein . . . opens into the sublobular vein, and thence into the hepatic vein.

Holden, Anat. (1885), p. 597.

Sublobular veins, branches of the hepatic vein on which the hepatic lobules lie and into which the intralobular veins discharge.

sublunar (sub-lū'nār), a. [= F. sublunaire = Sp. Pg. sublunar = It. sublunare, < L. sub, under, + luna, the moon; see lunar.] Situated beneath or nearer than the moon.

This vast sublunar vault. Milton, P. L., iv. 777.

The city's moonlit spires and myriad lamps

Like stars in a sublunar sky did glow.

Shelley, Revolt of Islam, v. 1.

sublunary (sub-lū'nār-i), a. and n. [See sublunar.] 1. a. 1. Situated beneath the moon.

Each sublunary bodie is composite
Of the lower elements, which are propode
By Nature to that end.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 116.

Hence—2. Pertaining to this world; terrestrial; mundane; earthly; worldly: as, sublunary affairs.

All things which are sublunary are subject to change.

Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

Am I not now dying a victim to the horror and the mystery of the wildest of all sublunary visions?

Poe, Tales, I. 418.

II. n. Any worldly thing.

That these sublunaries have their greatest freshness plac'd in only Hope, it is a conviction undeniable; that, upon enjoyment, all our joys do vanish.

Feltham, Resolves, ii. 66.

sublunate (sub-lū'nāt), a. Approaching the form of a crescent; subrescentic: as, a sublunate mark.

subluxate (sub-luk'sāt), v. t. To dislocate partially.

subluxation (sub-luk-sā'shōn), n. Partial dislocation.

submammary (sub-mam'g-ri), a. Situated beneath or below the mammary gland; inframammary; also, more deeply seated than this gland. Submammary abscess, an abscess between the mammary gland and the chest-wall. Submammary region. Same as inframammary region (which see, under inframammary).

submargin (sub-mār-jin'), n. In entom., a space parallel to a margin and but slightly separated from it.

submarginal (sub-mār'ji-nāl), a. In bot. and zool., situated near the margin. Submarginal cells, in entom., a series of cells in the wing of a hymenopterous insect lying behind the stigma and marginal vein. Submarginal vein or nerve, in hymenopterous insects, one of the transverse nerves separating the submarginal cell. In the Chalcididae it is a short subcostal vein running from the base of the wing and bending upward to the costal margin, where it takes the name of the costal vein.

submarginate (sub-mār'ji-nāt), a. In entom., furnished with a margin which is slightly separated from the edge.

submargined (sub-mār'jind), a. Same as submarginate.

submarine (sub-mā-rēn'), a. and n. [= F. sous-marin = Sp. Pg. submarino; as sub + marin.]

I. a. 1. Situated or living under or in the sea, either at the bottom or below the surface; below the surface of the sea: as, submarine plants; a submarine telegraph. 2. Occurring or carried on below the surface of the sea: as, submarine explorations; designed for use under the sea: as, submarine armor. Submarine armor. See armor. Submarine boat, a boat which is so fitted that it can be propelled when entirely submerged, and carries a sufficient amount of compressed air to admit of remaining below the surface for several hours. The chief object sought is the carrying and operating of torpedoes. Submarine cable. See cable. Submarine denudation, denudation which takes place beneath the level of the sea. Some geologists, however, do not clearly distinguish between marine and submarine denudation. In the former, all denudation under or at the edge of the sea is properly included; in the latter, only that which takes place beneath the sea-level. Submarine forest. See forest. Submarine gun, a gun adapted for the discharge of projectiles below the surface of the water. Submarine lamp, mine, etc. See the nouns. Submarine volcano, a volcano begun beneath the sea, but usually developed by the continued action of the eruptive forces so as to rise above the sea-level, and sometimes to a very considerable height. Some islands thus begun by submarine volcanic agencies have disappeared after a time; others have been permanent. The Mediterranean, the vicinity of the Azores, and the coast of Iceland are localities where submarine volcanic action has been exhibited on a grand scale.

II. n. A submarine plant.

submaster (sub-mās'tēr), n. [OF. sousmaître, F. sousmaître, < ML. submagister, a submaster, < L. sub, under, + magister, master; see master.] A subordinate or deputy master: as, the submaster of a school.

submaxilla (sub-mak-sil'ā), n.; pl. submaxillæ (-ē). The under jaw or mandible; especially, the submaxillary bone, or bone of the under jaw.

submaxillary (sub-mak'si-lā-ri), n. and a. I. n.; pl. submaxillaries (-riz). The inferior maxillary bone; the under jaw-bone, inframaxillary, or mandible.

II. a. 1. (a) Of or pertaining to the under jaw or inferior maxilla; forming the basis of the lower jaw, as a bone or bones; mandibular. (b) Of or pertaining to the submaxillary gland: as, submaxillary secretion or saliva.

2. Situated under the jaws: as, the submaxillary triangle. Submaxillary artery, one of several large branches of the facial artery which supply the submaxillary gland and neighboring parts. Submaxillary duct, the duct of Wharton. Submaxillary fossa. See fossa. Submaxillary ganglion. See ganglion. Submaxillary gland, a salivary gland situated beneath the lower jaw, on either side, discharging beneath the tongue by Wharton's duct: it is innervated from the chorda tympani and sympathetic nerves. See cut under salivary. Submaxillary nerve, the inframaxillary nerve. Submaxillary region. Same as suprahyoid region (which see, under suprahyoid). Submaxillary triangle. See triangle. Submaxillary vein, a tributary of the facial vein draining the submaxillary gland.

submaximal (sub-mak'si-nāl), a. Nearly but not quite maximal.

Submaximal nerve-irritations.

W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 235.

submedial (sub-mē'di-āl), a. Same as submedian.

submedian (sub-mē'di-ān), a. Situated near but not at the middle; specifically, in conch., admedian; lying next the middle line on each side, as certain teeth of the radula. Also submedial. Submedian cell, in entom., same as internomedian cell (which see, under internomedian).

submediant (sub-mē'di-ant), n. In music, the tone of a scale midway between the subdominant and the upper tonic; the sixth, as B in the scale of D. Also called superdominant.

submembranous (sub-mem'brā-nus), a. Somewhat membranous; a little leathery or coriaceous.

submeningeal (sub-mē-nin'jē-āl), a. Situated beneath the meninges.

submental (sub-men'tal), a. [< submentum + -al.] 1. Situated beneath the chin, or under the edge of the lower jaw. Specifically—2. In entom., of or pertaining to the submentum. Submental artery, the largest of the cervical branches of the facial artery, given off in the region of the submaxillary gland, and distributed to the muscles of the jaw. Submental vein, that one of the tributary veins of the facial vein which accompanies the submental artery.

submentum (sub-men'tum), n.; pl. submenta (-tā). [NL., < L. sub, under, + mentum, the chin; see mentum.] In entom., the proximal one of two basal median parts or pieces of the labium, the other being the mentum; the proximal one of the two basal parts of the second maxilla. See cuts under mouth-part, palpus, Hymenoptera, and Insecta.

submerge (sub-mérj'), v.; pret. and pp. submerged, ppr. submerging. [< OF. soubmerger, F. submerger = Pr. submerger, submergir = Sp. sumergir = Pg. submergir = It. sommorgere, < L. submergere, summergere, plunge under, sink, overwhelm, < sub, under, + mergere, dip, sink, plunge; see merge.] I. trans. 1. To put under water; plunge.—2. To cover or overflow with water; inundate; drown.

So half my Egypt were submerged, and made A cistern for scaled snakes!

Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 94.

Submerged bog, submerged forest, a bog or forest sunk below its original position, so that it has become covered by water. Thus, at Clonea, near Dungarvan, in Ireland, there are remains of an ancient pine forest, miles in length, now usually covered with many fathoms of water. Submerged pump. See pump.

II. intrans. To sink under water; be buried or covered, as by a fluid; sink out of sight.

There is . . . a plot, which emerges more than once, for carrying the King to Rouen; plot after plot emerging and submerging, like ignes fatui in foul weather, which lead nowhither.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. iii. 4.

submergence (sub-mēr'jens), n. [< submerge + -ence.] The act of submerging, or plunging under water; the state of being submerged; submersion; hence, a sinking out of sight.

submerse (sub-mērs'), v. t. [< L. submersus, summersus, pp. of submergere, summergere, submergere; see submerge.] To put under water; submerge. [Rare.]

submerse (sub-mērs'), a. [< L. submersus, pp.: see the verb.] Same as submersed.

submersed (sub-mērst'), p. a. In bot., growing under water, as the leaves of aquatic plants. Also demersed and submerged.

submersible (sub-mēr'si-bl), a. [< submerge + -ible.] That may be submersed. The Engineer, LXVII. 59.

submersion (sub-mēr'shōn), n. [= F. submersion = Sp. sumersion = Pg. submersão = It. sommersione, < L. submersio(n-), summersio(n-), a sinking, submerging, < L. submergere, summergere, submerge; see submerge.] The act of submerging, or the state of being submerged.

submetallic (sub-me-tal'ik), a. Imperfectly or partially metallic: as, the submetallic luster of wolfram.

submiliary (sub-mil'i-ā-ri), a. Slightly smaller than miliary. Lancet, 1891, I.

subminimal (sub-min'i-māl), a. Less than minimal.

subminister (sub-min'is-tēr), v. [< OF. subministrare = Sp. suministrar = Pg. subministrar, < L. subministrare, sumministrare, aid by giving, afford, supply, < sub, under, + ministrare, attend, provide, furnish, < minister, an attendant; see minister.] I. trans. To supply; afford; administer. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Man-kind, p. 154.

II. intrans. To subserve; be useful; be subservient. Sir R. L'Estrange.

subministrant (sub-min'is-trant), a. [< L. subministrans, sumministrans(t)-s, ppr. of subministrare, sumministrare, aid by giving, supply: see subminister.] Subservient; subordinate. Bacon.

subministratē (sub-min'is-trāt), v. t. [< L. subministratus, sumministratus, pp. of subministrare, sumministrare, aid by giving, supply: see subminister.] Same as subminister. Harvey.

subministration (sub-min-is-trā'shōn), n. [< OF. subministratio = Sp. suministración = Pg. subministração, < L. subministratio(n-), sumministratio(n-), a giving, supplying: see subministrare.] The act of subministering, or furnishing or supplying. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 529.

submit (sub-mis'), a. [= OF. submis, soumis, soumis, soumis = Sp. sumiso = Pg. sumisso = It. sommesso, < L. submitus, summissus, pp. of submittere, summittere, put under, lower, reduce; see submit.] 1. Humble; submissive. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Nearer his presence—Adam, though not awed,
Yet with submit approach and reverence meek,
As to a superior nature bowing low.

Milton, P. L., v. 359.

A simple, submit, humble style.

C. Mather, Mag. Chris., Int.

2. Low; soft; gentle.

Thus th' old Hebrew muttering gan to speak
In submit voice, that Isaac might not hear His bitter grief.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Fathers.

These are crying sins, and have shrill voices in heaven; neither are they submit and whispering on the earth.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 213.

submission (sub-mish'ən), n. [< OF. submis-sion, soumission, soumission, F. soumission = Sp. submisión = Pg. submissão = It. submissione, < L. submissio(n-), submissio(n-), a letting down, lowering, sinking, < submittere, summittre, pp. submissus, submissus, put under, let down, lower, reduce: see submit.] 1. The act of submitting, in any sense of that word; especially, the act of yielding; entire surrender to the control or government of another.

*Submission, Dauphin! 'tis a mere French word;
We English warriors wot not what it means.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 7. 54.*

*'Tis known we are up, and marching. No submission,
No promise of base peace, can cure our maladies.
Fletcher, Loyal Subject, v. 4.*

2. The state of being submissive; humility; yielding of opinion; acquiescence.

*In all submission and humility York doth present himself unto your highness.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 58.*

3. Compliance with the commands or laws of a superior; obedience.

*This Passage was a little pleasing to the King, to think that he had a Judge of such Courage, and a Son of such Submission.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 163.*

*God will relent, and quit thee all his debt;
Who ever more approves, and more accepts (Best pleased with humble and filial submission).
Milton, S. A., 1. 511.*

4. In law, an agreement to submit a disputed point to arbitration. — Submission of the clergy, the agreement made by the clergy of the Church of England in convocation in 1532, and embodied in the act of Parliament of 1534 known as the Act of Submission, not to promulgate new canons without the royal assent. = Syn. 4. Compliance, etc. See obedience.

submissive (sub-mis'iv), a. [< submit + -ive.] 1. Inclined or ready to submit; yielding to power or authority; obedient; humble.

*His heart relented
Towards her, his life so late, and sole delight,
Now at his feet submissive in distress.
Milton, P. L., x. 942.*

2. Testifying or showing submission: of things.

*He bring him on submissive knees.
Brone, Antipodes, iii. 2.*

*He, in delight
Both of her beauty and submissive charms, Smiled with superlative love. Milton, P. L., iv. 498.*

*The sever'd Bars
Submissive clink again their brazen Portals.
Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.*

submissively (sub-mis'iv-li), adv. In a submissive manner; with submission; with acknowledgment of inferiority; humbly.

submissiveness (sub-mis'iv-nes), n. The state or quality of being submissive, in any sense of the word. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xi.

subnarcotic (sub-nār-kot'ik), a. Moderately narcotic.

subnasal (sub-nā'zāl'), a. Situated at the bottom of or under the nose; specifically, situated at the base of the anterior nasal spine. — Subnasal point, in cranium, the middle of the inferior border of the anterior nares, or the root of the anterior nasal spine. See cut under craniometry.

subnascent (sub-nas'ent'), a. [< L. subnascent(-t)-s, ppr. of subnasci, grow up under or out of, follow after, < sub, under, + nasci, be born: see nascent.] Growing underneath.

Of noxious influence to the subnascent plants of other kinds. Evelyn, Sylva, l. xii. § 1.

subnatural (sub-na'tū-rāl'), a. Below nature; infranatural; hypophysical.

Subnecromorphotica (sub-nek'rō-mōr-fot'i-kā), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), < L. sub, un- der, + Gr. νεκρός, a dead body, + μορφή, form.] A division of neuropterous insects (in a broad sense), including those which have quiescent incomplete pupæ, which, however, acquire the power of locomotion before they assume the perfect state. It corresponds closely with the modern restricted order Neuroptera (as distinguished from the Pseudoneuroptera).

subnect (sub-nekt'), v. t. [< L. subnectere, tie under, bind on beneath, < sub, under, + nectere, pp. nexus, bind, tie, fasten. Cf. annex, connect: see also subnex.] To tie, buckle, or fasten beneath. Imp. Dict.

subnervian (sub-nēr'vi-an), a. Same as subneural. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 679.

subneural (sub-nū'ral'), a. Situated beneath a main neural axis or nervous cord: in annelids, specifying that one of the longitudinal trunks of the pseudohemal system which runs beneath the ganglionic cord, as in the earthworm. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 185.

subnex (sub-neks'), v. t. [< L. subnexus, pp. of subnectere, tie under: see subnect.] To subjoin; add. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 873.

subnitrate (sub-nī'trāt'), n. A basic nitrate, capable of saturating more nitric acid, thus forming a normal nitrate.

subniveal (sub-nī'vē-āl'), a. Same as subnivean.

subnivean (sub-nī'vē-an), a. Situated or carried on under the snow. [Rare.]

At a spot where the whiffing winds had left the earth nearly bare [of snow], he commenced his subnivean work. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 17.

Subnobiles (sub-nob'i-lēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. sub, under, + nobilis, noble.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a cohort of the order Proceres, established to distinguish the Apterygidae or kiwis from other ratite or struthious birds.

subnodal (sub-nō'dāl'), a. In entom., situated behind the nodus, a point near the center of the costal margin, in the wings of certain dragonflies, where the nervures appear to be knotted.

subnormal (sub-nōr'māl'), a. and n. I. a. 1. Less than normal; abnormal by defect or deficiency. — 2. In math., cut off by the normal.

II. n. That part of the axis of abscissas of a curve which is intercepted between the normal and the ordinate. — Polar subnormal, the line drawn from the origin of polar coordinates perpendicular to the radius vector to meet the normal.

subnormality (sub-nōr-mal'i-ti), n. [< subnormal + -ity.] The state or condition of being subnormal. Lancet, 1890, l. 105.

subnotation (sub-nō-tā'shən), n. [< L. subnotatio(n-), a signing underneath, a subscription, < subnotare, pp. subnotatus, note or write underneath, subscribe, < sub, under, + notare, note, mark: see not.] Same as rescript, 1.

subnubilar (sub-nū'bi-lār'), a. [< L. sub, under, + nubila, clouds (see subnubular), + -ar.] Situated under the clouds. [Rare.]

The every-day observation of the most unlettered man who treads the fields and is wet with the mists and rains must convince him that there is no sub-nubilar solid sphere. Dawson, Origin of the World, p. 63.

subnude (sub-nūd'), a. In bot., almost naked or bare of leaves.

subnubular (sub-nū'vō-lār'), a. [< L. sub, under, + It. nuvola, a cloud, < L. nubila, clouds, neut. pl. of nubilus, cloudy: see nubilous. Cf. L. subnubilus, somewhat cloudy, < sub, under, + nubilus, cloudy.] Somewhat cloudy; partially covered or obscured by clouds. [Rare.]

Subnubular lights of evening. Lord Houghton.

subobscure (sub-ob-skūr'), a. [< L. subobscurus, somewhat obscure, < sub, under, + obscurus, obscure: see obscure.] Somewhat obscure.

subobscurely (sub-ob-skūr'li), adv. Somewhat obscurely or darkly. Donne, Devotions, p. 218.

subobtuse (sub-ob-tūs'), a. Somewhat obtuse.

suboccipital (sub-ok-sip'i-tāl'), a. 1. Situated under the hindhead, or below (back of) the occipital bone, as a nerve. — 2. Situated on the under surface of the occipital lobe of the brain, as a gyrus or a fissure. — Suboccipital nerve, the first cervical nerve. — Suboccipital triangle. See triangle.

suboceanic (sub-ō-shē-an'ik), a. Lying beneath the ocean. Nature, XL. 658.

subocellate (sub-os'el-āt'), a. Indistinctly ocellate; somewhat resembling an ocellus; in entom., noting spots on the wings of butterflies, etc., surrounded by a ring of another color, but destitute of a central spot or pupil. Also called blind or epupillate spots.

suboctave (sub-ok'tāv'), n. 1. An eighth part. Our gallon, which has the pint for its suboctave. Arbutnot, Anc. Coins.

2. In music, the octave below a given tone.—Suboctave coupler, an organ bellows, a couple which adds to the main tone but without striking, either on the same keyboard or on another.

suboctuple (sub-ok'tupl), a. Containing one part or eight; having the ratio 1:8. Sp. Wilkins, Archimedes, vii.

subocular (sub-ok'ulär), a. [L. subocularis, that is beneath the eye, < sub, under, + ocularis, pertaining to the eye, < oculus, eye.] Situated under the eye; suborbital; suboptic.—Subocular antenna, in entom., antennae inserted below the eyes, as in most Hemiptera.

subesophageal, a. See subesophageal.

subopercle (sub-ō-pēr'kl), n. The subopercular bone, or suboperculum, of a fish.

suboperculum (sub-ō-pēr'ku-lum), a. [L. suboperculum + -arē.] Composing a lower part of the operculum or gill-flap of a fish; pertaining to a suboperculum in any sense, or having its character. See cut under opercular.

suboperculum (sub-ō-pēr'ku-lum), n.; pl. subopercula (-lā). [NL., < L. sub, under, + operculum, a lid, cover.] 1. In ichth., the subopercular bone, an inferior one of four opercular bones usually entering into the composition of the gill-cover, of which it forms a part of the lower margin. See cuts under opercular and teleost.—2. In anat. of the brain, a part of an orbital gyre which to some extent covers the insula or island of Reil in front, and is situated under the preoperculum.

suboptic (sub-op'tik), a. Same as suborbital: as, the suboptic foramen.

suboral (sub-ō'ral), a. Placed under the mouth or oral orifice.

Other specimens with the characteristic dorsal surface have no suboral avicularium. Geol. Jour., LXVII. 6.

suborbicular (sub-ōr-bik'ū-lār), a. Almost orbiculate or orbicular; nearly circular.

suborbiculate (sub-ōr-bik'ū-lāt), a. Same as suborbicular.

suborbital (sub-ōr'bi-tal), a. and n. I. a. Situated below the orbit of the eye or on the floor of that orbit; infra-orbital; subocular. Also suboptic, suborbital.—Suborbital cartilage. See II.—Suborbital foramen, the infra-orbital foramen (which see, under foramen).—Suborbital fossa. Same as canine fossa.

II. n. A special formation of parts below, along the lower border of, or on the floor of the orbit of the eye. (a) A branch of the second division of the fifth nerve, which in various animals, as man, runs under the orbit and escapes upon the cheek through the suborbital foramen. (b) One of a chain of bones or cartilages which in many of the lower vertebrates borders the brim of the orbit below, and corresponds to a like series which may form the supra-orbital margin. The great development of one of these suborbitals is a prominent feature of the mail-cheeked or cottoid fishes. See Scleroparia, and cut under teleost.

subordain (sub-ōr-dān'), v. t. To ordain to an inferior position. [Rare.]

For she is thine in her acts and powre,
But so is not that Powre omnipotent
That Nature subordain'd chief Governor
Of fading creatures while they do endure.

Davies, Mirum in Modum, p. 24. (Davies.)

suborder (sub-ōr'dēr), n. 1. In bot. and zool., a subdivision of an order; a group subordinate to an order; a superfamily. See family, 6, and order, n., 5.—2. In arch., a subordinate or secondary order; an order introduced for decoration, or chiefly so, as distinguished from a main order of the structure.

In the triforium of the choir [of the cathedral of Senlis] the shafts which carry the sub-orders of the arches are comparatively slender monoliths.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 202.

subordinacy (sub-ōr'di-nā-si), n. [L. subordinatus + -cy.] The state of being subordinate, or subject to control; subordination. [Rare.]

He forms a Whole, coherent and proportioned in itself, with due Subjection and Subordinacy of constituent Parts. Shaftesbury, Advice to an Author, i. § 3.

subordinal (sub-ōr'di-nāl), a. [NL. subordo (-ordin-), suborder (< L. sub, under, + ordo, order), + -al.] Of the classificatory rank or taxonomic value of a suborder; subordinate to an order, as a group or division of animals; or pertaining to a suborder.

subordinate (sub-ōr'di-nans), n. [L. subordinatus + -e.] Same as subordinacy.

subordinacy (sub-ōr'di-nā-si), n. [As subordinatus + -cy.] 1. Subordinacy.—2. Subordinate places or offices collectively.

The subordinate of the church is a subordinate of the hands so subordinary (sub-ōr'di-nā-ri), n. In her., a bearing of simple figure, often appearing, but not considered so common or so important as one of the ordinaries. See ordinary, 9. Those bearings which are called ordinaries by some writers and not by others are called subordinates by these latter: such are the pile, the inescutcheon, the bend sinister, the canton or quarter, the border, the orle, and the point.

subordinate (sub-ōr'di-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. subordinated, ppr. subordinating. [L. subordinatus, pp. of subordinare (> It. subordinare = Sp. Pg. subordinar = F. subordonner), place in a lower order, make subject, < L. sub, under, + ordinare, order, arrange: see ordinate, order, v.] 1. To place in an order or rank below something else; make or consider as of less value or importance: as, to subordinate temporal to spiritual things.

So plans he,
Always subordinating (note the point!)
Revenge, the mauler sin, to interest,
The meaner. Browning, Ring and Book, II. 186.

All that is merely circumstantial shall be subordinated to and in keeping with what is essential. J. Caird.

2. To make auxiliary or subservient to something else; put under control or authority; make subject.

The stars fight in their courses under his banner, and subordinate their powers to the dictates of his will. South, Sermons, VII. 1.

The branch societies were subordinated to the central one. English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. cxxxv.

There is no known vertebrate in which the whole of the germ-product is not subordinated to a single axis. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 50.

Subordinating conjunction. See conjunction, 3.

subordinate (sub-ōr'di-nāt), a. and n. [= F. subordiné = Sp. Pg. subordinado = It. subordinato, < ML. subordinatus, place in a lower order: see subordinate, v.] I. a. 1. In a lower order or class; occupying a lower position in a descending scale; secondary.

Life is the function of the animal's body considered as one whole, just as the subordinate functions are those of the body's several sets of organs.

Mivart, Nature and Thought, p. 188.

2. Inferior in order, nature, dignity, power, rank, importance, etc.

It was subordinate, not enslaved, to the understanding. South.

The great . . . are naturally averse to a power raised over them, and whose weight must ever lean heaviest on the subordinate orders. Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

Subordinate clause. See clause, 1.—Subordinate clause. (a) In gram., same as dependent clause. (See under clause, 3.) Such a clause has the value of either a noun, an adjective, or an adverb in some other clause to which it is subordinated, being introduced either by a relative pronoun or an adverb, or by a subordinating conjunction. (b) In law, a clause in a statute which, from its position or the nature of its substance, or especially by reason of grammatical relation as above indicated, must be deemed controlled or restrained in its meaning if it conflicts with another clause in the same statute.—Subordinate end. See end.—Syn. Subservient, minor.

II. n. One inferior in power, order, rank, dignity, office, etc.; one who stands in order or rank below another; often, one below and under the orders of another; in gram., a word or clause dependent on another.

His next subordinate,

Milton, P. L., v. 671.

subordinately (sub-ōr'di-nāt-li), adv. In a subordinate manner; in a lower order, class, rank, or dignity; as of inferior importance.

subordinateness (sub-ōr'di-nāt-nes), n. The state of being subordinate or inferior.

subordination (sub-ōr'di-nā'shon), n. [= F. subordination = Sp. subordinación = Pg. subordinación = It. subordinazione, < *ML. subordinatio (-n-), < subordinare, subordinate: see subordinate.] 1. The act of subordinating, subjecting, or placing in a lower order, rank, or position, or in proper degrees of rank; also, the state of being subordinate or inferior; inferiority of rank or dignity.

There being no Religion that tends so much to the peace of mens minds and the preservation of civil Societies as this [the Christian religion] doth; yet all this it doth by way of subordination to the great end of it, which is the promoting mens eternal happiness.

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

In his narrative a due subordination is observed: some transactions are prominent; others retire.

Macaulay, History.

2. Degree of lesser rank.

Persons who, in their several subordinations, would be obliged to follow the example of their superiors. Swift.

3. The state of being under control of government; subjection to rule; habit of obedience to orders.

Never, never more shall we behold that generous loyalty to rank and sex, that proud submission, that dignified obedience, that subordination of the heart, which kept alive, even in servitude itself, the spirit of an exalted freedom. Burke, Rev. in France.

They were without subordination, patience, industry, or any of the regular habits demanded for success in such an enterprise. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 8.

subordinationism (sub-ōr'di-nā'shon-izm), n. [L. subordination + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine that the second and third persons of the Trinity are inferior to God the Father as regards (a) order only, or (b) as regards essence. The former doctrine is considered orthodox, the latter is that of the Arians and others.

Justin . . . did not hold a strict subordinationism.

Liddon, Divinity of Our Lord, p. 430.

subordinative (sub-ōr'di-nā-tiv), a. [L. subordinate + -ive.] Tending to subordinate; causing, implying, or expressing subordination or dependence.

suborn (sub-ōrn'), v. t. [F. suborner = Sp. Pg. subornar = It. subornare, < L. subornare, furnish, equip, fit out, incite secretly, < sub, under, + ornare, fit out, provide, ornament.] 1. To furnish; equip; adorn; ornament.

Evill things, being decked and suborned with the gay attyre of goodly woordes, may easily deceave.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

So men oppressed, when weary of their breath,
Throw off the burden, and suborn their death.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 1039.

3. To bribe or unlawfully procure to some act of wickedness—specifically, in law, to giving false testimony; induce, as a witness, to perjury.

He had put to death two of the kynges which were the chiefe autours of this newe reuolte, and had suborned Guarionexius and the other kynges to attempte the same.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 84].

By heaven, fond wretch, thou know'st not what thou speak'st;
Or else thou art suborn'd against his honour

In hateful practice. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 106.

It was he indeed

Suborned us to the calumny.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

A faithless clerk, who had been suborned . . . to betray their consultations, was promptly punished.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 148.

To bribe a trustee, as such, is in fact neither more nor less than to suborn him to be guilty of a breach or an abuse of trust. Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, [xvi. 27, note 3.]

subornation (sub-ōr-nā'shon), n. [= F. subornation = Sp. subornación = Pg. subornação = It. subornazione, < ML. subornatio (-n-), < L. subornare, pp. subornatus, furnish, suborn: see suborn.] 1. The act of procuring wrongfully.—2. The act of procuring one by persuasion, bribery, etc., to do a criminal or bad action; specifically, in law, the crime of procuring perjured testimony; procuring a witness to commit the crime of perjury: more specifically called subornation of perjury.

The subornation of witnesses, or the corrupt sentence of a judge!

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xvii.

Foul subornation is predominant.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 145.

suborner (sub-ōr'nēr), n. [L. suborn + -er.] One who suborns; one who procures another to do a bad action, especially to take a false oath. Bacon, Charge at Session for the Verge.

subpectinate (sub-pek'ti-nät), a. Imperfectly pectinate, as antennae which exhibit a form between serrate and pectinate.

subpeduncular (sub-pë-dung'kü-lär), a. Situated below a peduncle of the cerebellum.—Subpeduncular lobe of the cerebellum. Same as folculus.

subpedunculate (sub-pë-dung'kü-lät), a. Having a very short stem or peduncle; scarcely pedunculate; subpetiolate. See cut under Polistes.

subpellucid (sub-pe-lü'sid), a. Nearly or almost pellucid; somewhat pellucid or clear.

subpena, subpenal. See subpana, subpanal.

Subpentamera (sub-pen-tam'e-rä), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Cryptopentamera or Pseudotetramera.

subpentamerous (sub-pen-tam'e-rus), a. Same as cryptopentamerous or pseudotetramerous.

subpentangular (sub-pen-tang'gü-lär), a. Irregularly or imperfectly pentagonal; having five sides of different lengths, or five rounded-off angles.

subpericardial (sub-per-i-kär'di-äl), a. Situated or occurring beneath the pericardium.

subpericranial (sub-per-i-krä'ni-äl), a. Situated or occurring under the pericranium.

subperiosteal (sub-per-i-os'të-äl), a. Situated or occurring beneath the periosteum.—Subperiosteal amputation, an amputation in which the periosteum is dissected up from the bone before the bone is cut, so that the cut end of the bone may be covered by the flaps of periosteum.—Subperiosteal blastema, the osteogenic layer of the periosteum. Kölliker.

subperiosteally (sub-per-i-os'të-äl-i), adv. In a subperiosteal manner.

subperitoneal (sub-per'i-tö-në-äl), a. Situated beneath the peritoneum—that is, on its outer or attached surface.—Subperitoneal abscess, an abscess situated between the abdominal wall and the parietal peritoneum.—Subperitoneal fascia, the layer of areolar and fatty tissue attaching the peritoneum to the surfaces it covers.

subpermanent (sub-për'mä-nent), a. Somewhat permanent; remaining for a time, but with gradual loss of intensity: as, the subpermanent magnetism of iron.

It was impossible in many cases to avoid imparting subpermanent torsion. Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 42.

subperpendicular (sub-për-pen-dik'ü-lär), n. A subnormal.

subpetiolar (sub-pet'i-ö-lär), a. In bot., situated under or within the base of the petiole, as the leaf-buds of the plane-tree (Platanus).

subpetiolate (sub-pet'i-ö-lät), a. 1. In bot., having a very short petiole.—2. In zool., somewhat petiolate, as an insect's abdomen; subpedunculate. See cut under Polistes.

subpharyngeal (sub-fä-rin'jë-äl), a. Situated beneath or below the pharynx, as a nervous ganglion or commissure.

subphratry (sub'frä'tri), n. A subdivision of a phratry. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 474.

To remain; continue; abide; retain the existing state.

Firm we subsist, but possible to swerve.

It is a pity the same fashion don't subsist now.

2. To have continued existence; exist.

Can the body Subsist, the soul departed? 'tis as easy As I to live without you.

Those ideas which Plato sometimes contends to be substances, and to subsist alone by themselves.

These enthusiasts do not scruple to avow their opinion that a state can subsist without any religion better than with one.

3. To be maintained; be supported; live.

Had it been moved let it subsist on other men's charity.
J. Althorp.

4. To subsist; have existence by means of something else.

Though the several names of these qualities are sufficiently distinct from one another, yet when they come to be considered in particular, and to be clothed with several accidents, then the subsistence is not so easy.
South.

II. trans. 1†. To keep in existence.

The old town [of Solvay] is thinly inhabited; the present city, which is a poor place, is to the west of it, and is chiefly subsisted by being a great thorough fare.

Washington, quoted in Adams's Works, II. 360.

subsistence (sub-sis'tens), n. [= F. subsistance = Sp. Pg. subsistencia = It. sussistenza, < L. subsistentia, substance, reality, ML. also stability, < L. subsisten(t)-s, ppr. of subsistere, continue, subsist; see subsistent.] 1. Real being; actual existence.

Their difference from the Pharisees was about the future reward, which being denied, they by consequence of that error fell into the rest, to deny the Resurrection, the subsistence spiritually, &c.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 144.

2†. Continuance; continued existence.

This Liberty of the Subject concerns himself and the subsistence of his own regal power in the first place.
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

Subsistence is perpetual existence.
Swedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 19.

3. That which exists or has real being.—4. The act or process of furnishing support to animal life, or that which is furnished; means of support; support; livelihood.

In China they speak of a Tree called Magnais, which affords not only good Drink, being pierced, but all things else that belong to the subsistence of Man.
Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Those of the Hottentots that live by the Dutch Town have their greatest subsistence from the Dutch, for there is one or more of them belonging to every house.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 540.

5. The state of being subsistent; inherence in something else: as, the subsistence of qualities in bodies.—Subsistence department, a military staff department in the United States army, which has charge of the purchase or procurement of all provisions for the supply of the army. Its chief officer is the commissary-general of subsistence, with the rank of brigadier-general.

Subsistence diet, the lowest amount of food on which life can be supported in health.—Subsistence stores (mil'it), the food-supplies procured and issued for the support of an army. The phrase also covers the grain, hay, straw, or other forage supplied for the sustenance and bedding of animals intended for slaughter in order to provide an army with fresh meat.—Syn. 4. Sustenance, etc. See living.

subsistent (sub-sis'ten-si), n. [As subsistence (see -cy).] Same as subsistence.

A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistence with a transmigration of their souls.
Sir T. Browne.

We know as little how the union is dissolved that is the chain of these differing subsistencies that compound us, as how it first commenced.
Glanville.

subsistent (sub-sis'tent), a. [= F. subsistant = Sp. Pg. subsistente = It. sussistente, < L. subsistent(t)-s, ppr. of subsistere, continue, subsist; see subsist.] 1. Continuing to exist; having existence; subsisting.

Such as deny there are spirits subsistent without bodies.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 10.

2. Inherent.

These qualities are not subsistent in those bodies, but are operations of fancy begotten in something else.
Bentley.

subsistential (sub-sis'ten'shal), a. Pertaining to subsistence; especially, in theol., pertaining to the divine subsistence or essence.

Having spoken of the effects of the attributes of God's essence as such, we must next speak of the effects of his three great attributes which some call subsistential—that is, his omnipotency, understanding, and will.
Baxter, Divine Life, i. 7.

subsister (sub-sis'ter), n. [< subsist + -er¹.] One who subsists; specifically, one who is supported by others; a poor prisoner.

Like a subsister in a gown of rugge rent on the left shoulder, to sit singing the counter-tenor by the cage in South-wake.
Knot-Hunt's Dream (1592). (Hall's.)

subsizar (sub'si'zär), n. An under-sizar; a student of lower standing than a sizar. Also spelled subzizer.

Friar Bacon's subzizer is the greatest blockhead in all Oxford.
Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

How lackeys and subzizers press
And scramble for degrees.
Bp. Corbet, Ans. to A Certain Poem.

subsoil (sub'soil), n. The under-soil; the bed or stratum of earth or earthy matter which lies immediately under the surface soil, and which is less finely disintegrated and contains less organic matter than that. When, as is often the case, it is densely compacted, it becomes what is frequently called hard-pan. In agriculture a great deal depends on the character of the subsoil, more especially as to whether it does or does not permit water to pass through it.

Subsoil is the broken-up part of the rocks immediately under the soil. Its character of course is determined by that of the rock out of which it is formed by subaerial disintegration.
A. Geikie, Encyc. Brit., X. 237.

Subsoil-plow. See plow.

subsoil (sub'soil), v. t. [< subsoil, n.] In agri., to employ the subsoil-plow upon; plow up so as to cut into the subsoil.

The farmer drains, irrigates, or subsoils portions of it.
J. S. Mill.

subsoiler (sub'soi-lër), n. [< subsoil + -er¹.] One who or that which subsoils; an implement or part of an implement used in subsoiling. The Engineer, LXX. 472.

subsolar (sub-sō'lär), a. [< L. sub, under, + sol, the sun; see *solar*¹.] Being under the sun; terrestrial; specifically, being between the tropics. Fitzroy, Weather Book, p. 71.

subsolarly (sub'sō-lä-ri), a. Same as subsolar.

The causes and effects of all Things done upon this subsolarly ball.
A. Brome, Paraphrase on Eccles., i.

subsolid (sub-sol'id), n. A solid incompletely inclosed.

subspatulate (sub-spat'ū-lät), a. Nearly or somewhat spatulate.

subspecies (sub'spē-si'shēz), n.; pl. subspecies.

[< NL. subspecies, < L. sub, under, + species, species.] In zool. and bot., a variety of a species; a climatic or geographical race recognizably different from another, yet not specifically distinguished; a conspecies. The nearest synonym is race. (See *race*³, n., 5 (a) (b).) Subspecies is a stronger and stricter word than variety, though nearly synonymous with the latter in its biological sense; it means decidedly more than strain, sport, or breed in like senses. The interpretation of subspecies and their actual handling in zoological and botanical taxonomy have been much mooted. Such forms are commonly regarded as nascent or incipient species (see species, 5) which have acquired subspecific characters under varying conditions of environment, and whose specific invalidity is determinable by the fact of their intergradation. See intergrade, v. i.

subspecific (sub-spē-sif'ik), a. Of the nature of a subspecies; not quite specific; conspecific.

subspecifically (sub-spē-sif'i-kal-i), adv. As a subspecies. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 819.

subspenoidal (sub-sfē-noi'dal), a. Situated beneath or on the under side of the spenoid.

subsphere (sub'sfēr), n. A solid imperfectly or approximately spherical.

subspherical (sub-sfēr'i-kal), a. Imperfectly spherical; of a form approaching that of a sphere.

subspherically (sub-sfēr'i-kal-i), adv. In the form of a subsphere. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 150.

subspinous (sub-spi'nus), a. 1. Somewhat spinous or prickly; like a spine to some extent: as, subspinous hairs in the pelage of a mammal.

—2. Situated under (ventrad of) the spinal column; hypaxial with reference to the backbone; subvertebral.—3. Situated or occurring below, beneath, or on the under side of a spine, as (1) of a vertebra, or (2) of the scapula; infraspinous: as, a subspinous muscle (the infraspinatus).

—Subspinous dislocation of the humerus, a dislocation in which the head of the humerus rests beneath the spine of the scapula.—Subspinous fossa, the fossa below the spine of the scapula; the infraspinous fossa.

subspiral (sub-spi'ral), a. Somewhat spiral; especially, in conch., noting the opercula of some shells which are faintly or indistinctly marked on one side with a spiral line, or this line itself. See cut under operculum.

subsplenial (sub-splē-ni-al), a. Situated under the splenium of the corpus callosum; noting certain cerebral gyres.

subst. An abbreviation of (a) substantive and (b) substitute.

substage (sub'stāj), n. An attachment to the compound microscope, placed beneath the ordinary stage, and used to support the achromatic condenser, the polarizing prism, etc.

It is usually arranged with a rack-and-pinion movement, centering screws, etc., by which the position may be adjusted; and in the swinging substage there is an arched arm upon which the support holding the condenser can be moved, so as to give very oblique illumination when desired.

substalagmite (sub-stā-lag'mit), n. A name used by Nelson for the compact deposit of carbonate of lime, without crystalline structure, filling crevices in the soft calcareous sandstone of Bermuda. Similar deposits when crystalline are called by him stalagmite. Trans. Geol. Soc. London, 1849, V. 106.

substalagmitic (sub-stal-ag-mit'ik), a. [< substalagmite + -ic.] Relating to or consisting of substalagmite. Darwin, Geol. Observations, I. vii. 162.

substance (sub'stans), n. [ME. substance, substance, < OF. substance, substance, F. substance = Sp. substancia, substancia = Pg. substancia = It. substanz, substanz, < L. substantia, being, essence, material, < substan(t)-s, ppr. of substare, stand under or among, be present, hold out, < sub, under, + stare, stand; see stand.] 1. That which exists by itself, and in which accidents inhere; that which receives modifications, and is not itself a mode; that which corresponds, in the reality of things, to the subject in logic.

Aristotle and Kant agree in making the conception of substance essentially the same as that of a subject of predication. But it is difficult to find a property by which substances may be recognized; for the above definition seems to afford none. Many philosophers hold that whatever is perdurable is substance. This, however, would include mechanical energy. Indeed, since every physical law can be stated in the form of an equation, and since that equation must have a constant term, it follows that every absolute uniformity of nature must consist in the perdurability of some quantity. Aristotle makes substances proper, called first substances, to be things individual; but this comports with few philosophical systems. Thus, in the medieval development of Aristotelianism, scientific propositions were regarded as universal statements concerning natures, so that the true subjects, or substances, were universal. Moreover, to make individuality the criterion of substance would seem to make space, as the source of individuality, the only first substance. At any rate, under that view, spatial positions would be substances in a preeminent sense. Others, remarking that the parts of space are not distinct in themselves, apart from their relations to material things, make self-existence, or the being distinct from all other things, not by virtue of modifications or characters, but by the thing's own nature, or arbitrary extrusion of itself, to be the chief mark of a substance, which would thus be most simply defined as an independent entity. Substance and essence are nearly synonymous, except that the latter cannot appropriately be used to designate an individual and lifeless thing.

They add . . . that as he (Christ) coupled the substance of his flesh and the substance of bread together, so we together should receive both.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 67.

Since the substance of your perfect self
Is also devoted, I am but a shadow;
And to your shadow will I make true love.

Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 2. 124.

A substance is a being subsisting of itself and subject to accidents. To subsist by itself is nothing else than not to be in anything as in a subject; and it agrees to all substances, even to God, but to be subject to accidents only to finite; for God is not subject to accidents.

Substance is either first or second. The first is a singular substance, or that which is not said of a subject, as Alexander, Bucephalus. The second is that which is said of a subject, as man, horse. For man is said of Alexander and Philip, and horse of Bucephalus and Cyllarus.

Burgesdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, i. 4.

I confess there is another idea which would be of general use for mankind to have, as it is of general talk as if they had it; and that is the idea of substance, which we neither have, nor can have, by sensation or reflection. If nature took care to provide us any ideas, we might well expect they should be such as by our own faculties we cannot procure to ourselves: but we see on the contrary that since by those ways whereby our ideas are brought into our minds this is not, we have no such clear idea at all, and therefore signify nothing by the word substance but only an uncertain supposition of we know not what, i. e., of something whereof we have no particular distinct positive idea, which we take to be the substratum, or support, of those ideas we do know. . . . Had the poor Indian philosopher (who imagined that the earth also wanted something to bear it up) but thought of this word substance, he needed not to have been at the trouble to find an elephant to support it, and a tortoise to support his elephant: the word substance would have done it effectually. And he that inquired might have taken it for as good an answer from an Indian philosopher, that substance, without knowing what it is, is that which supports the earth, as we take it for a sufficient answer and good doctrine from our European philosophers that substance, without knowing what it is, is that which supports accidents. So that of substance we have no idea of what it is, but only a confused obscure one of what it does.

Locke, Human Understanding, i. 4, § 18, and ii. 13, § 19.

Substance, if we leave out the sensuous condition of permanence, would mean nothing but a something that may be conceived as a subject, without being the predicate of anything else.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller, II. 130.

2. The real or essential part; the essence.

And wel I woot the substance is in me,
If any thing shal wel reported be.

Chaucer, Prol. to Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 37.

Miserable bigots, . . . who hate sects and parties different from their own more than they love the substance of religion.

Burke, Rev. in France.

At the close of the [seventeenth] century, . . . the sovereign retained the shadow of that authority of which the Tudors had held the substance.

Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

All the forms are fugitive,
But the substances survive.

Emerson, Woodnotes, ii.

3. In theol., the di'vine being or essence, common to the three persons of the Trinity.

One Lord Jesus Christ, . . . being of one substance with the Father. Nicene Creed.

My kynges, as shortly as I myght,
With ther powre and all ther hoole puyssance.

Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 1968.

Unto your grace do I in chief address
The substance of my speech.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. l. 32.

It seems swearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a Ceremony without Substance, as good as nothing.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 97.

6. Substantiality; that which establishes or gives firm support.

Faith is the substance (margin, ground or confidence) [assurance (margin, giving substance to), R. V.] of things hoped for. Heb. xi. 1.

7. Any particular kind of corporeal matter; stuff; material; part; body; specifically, a chemical species.

Sir, there she stands,
If aught within that little seeming substance
. . . may fitly like your grace,

She's there, and she is yours. Shak., Lear, i. l. 201.

All of one nature, of one substance bear.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. l. 11.

Books are as meats and viands are, some of good, some of evil substance. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 16.

It [chemistry] tells us that everything which exists here is really made up of one or more of only sixty-three different things; that the whole of the animal kingdom, the vegetable kingdom, the mineral kingdom, is made up of only sixty-three different substances.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 166.

8. Wealth; means; good estate: as, a man of substance.

His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels. Job i. 3.
